

1101
85
1200
94

The Bancroft Library

University of California • Berkeley

BRUCE PORTER COLLECTION

Gift of Mrs. Robert Bruce Porter

Henry James

LETTERS OF
THOMAS CARLYLE

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

Carlyle's Mother, Æt 71

After a Portrait in the possession of Mr. Alex. Carlyle

EARLY LETTERS OF
THOMAS CARLYLE

EDITED BY CHARLES ELIOT NORTON

VOL. I.

1814—1821

London
MACMILLAN AND CO.
AND NEW YORK
1886

COPYRIGHT

1886

By CHARLES ELIOT NORTON

PREFACE

MR. CARLYLE was for many years, especially during his early manhood, an industrious letter-writer. A great many of his letters have been preserved and are in the possession of his niece, Mrs. Alexander Carlyle. It is at her desire that I have undertaken to edit a selection of them.

“Express biography of me I had really rather that there should be none,” said Carlyle in his Will, and a biography of him, correct at least if meagre, might perhaps have been gathered from his letters, his Reminiscences,¹ and the Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle.²

¹ Reminiscences, etc., edited by J. A. Froude, 2 vols. London, 1881.

² Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. London, 1883.

Mr. Froude, however, thought otherwise, and has given to the public an "express biography" of him. The view of Mr. Carlyle's character presented in this biography has not approved itself to many of those who knew Carlyle best. It may be a striking picture, but it is not a good portrait.

For the present, at least, it appears impracticable to prepare another formal biography. The peculiar style of Mr. Froude's performance, already in possession of the field, might perhaps put a portrait of Carlyle drawn by a hand more faithful to nature, and less skilled in fine artifices than his own, at a temporary disadvantage with the bulk of readers. But it has seemed right to print some of Carlyle's letters in suchwise that with his Reminiscences they might serve as a partial autobiography, and illustrate his character by unquestionable evidence. They do not indeed afford a complete portrait; but so far as they go the lines will be correct.

69 The earliest letters of Carlyle that are known to exist are those which he wrote in 1814 and the three or four following years, while he was at Annan, Edinburgh, and Kirkcaldy. He seldom let a week pass without sending a letter home; not infrequently he wrote three or even four to different members of his family on the same day. I have printed a large number of these letters in spite of the sameness in their tone and topics, because of the light they throw upon Carlyle's character during an important period in his intellectual growth, and also because they are of more than personal interest from the striking illustration they afford of the simpler side of Scottish life.

Carlyle's chief correspondents, outside his own family, during the first years after his leaving the University, were three college friends, James Johnstone, Robert Mitchell, and Thomas Murray.

Carlyle, in his later years, writing of Johnstone, says, "He was six or seven years my elder, but very fond of discoursing with me, and much my companion while we were in Annandale together within reach. A poor and not a very gifted man, but a faithful, diligent, and accurate; of quietly pious, candid, pure character,—and very much attached to me. In return I liked him honestly well; learnt something from him (the always diligently exact in book-matters); perhaps ultimately taught him something; and had great satisfaction in his company (in the years 1814-16, and occasionally afterwards)." Mainly through the efforts of Miss Welsh (made for Carlyle's sake), he was in 1826 appointed Parish Schoolmaster at Haddington, where, towards the end of 1837, he died.
VOL. I. b

Mitchell was an Annandale man, who upon leaving college had looked forward to becoming a minister in the Scotch Kirk; but, like Carlyle, he soon gave up this outlook, and he became and remained a schoolmaster. He was for some years tutor in the family of the Rev. Henry Duncan, of Ruthwell, Dumfriesshire, was afterwards Rector of the Grammar School at Kirkcudbright, and latterly one of the masters of the Edinburgh Academy. Carlyle notes in his journal, 1st August 1836: "Poor R. Mitchell dead, and buried with public funeral, Calton Hill, Edinburgh; many sad thoughts I had sent towards him, but in silence."

Thomas Murray was a cheery, kindly youth. He became a minister, wrote a respectable literary history of Galloway, his native county, was for a time editor of the Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle, and lived to a good old age.

Still more interesting than these letters would have been Carlyle's letters to Edward Irving, but it is believed that they were destroyed after Irving's death.

As to what use I might be justified in making of another series of letters at my disposal, those from Carlyle to Miss Welsh from their first acquaintance in 1821 until their marriage in 1826, I have felt grave doubts. The letters of lovers are sacred confidences, whose sanctity none ought to violate. Mr. Froude's use of these letters seems to me, on general grounds, unjustifiable, and the motives he alleges for it inadequate. But Carlyle himself had strictly forbidden their printing. When he was editing the Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle, of her letters to him, and of his to her which were written before their marriage, only one short note from Miss Welsh, dated 3d September 1825, printed by Mr. Froude (Life,¹ i. 308, 309), could be found; the rest were missing. To the copy of this short note Carlyle appends the words, "In pencil all but the address. Original strangely saved; and found accidentally in one of the presses to-day. HER note, when put down by the coach, on that visit to us at Hoddam Hill in September 1825! How mournful now, how beautiful and strange! A relic to me priceless (T. C., 12th March 1868).” As to the then missing Letters written before their marriage, his and Miss Welsh’s, Carlyle, in the original manuscript from which the copy given to Mr. Froude was made, says, “My strict command now is, ‘Burn them, if ever found. Let no third party read them; let no printing of them, or of any part of them, be ever thought of by those who love me!’”

¹ Thomas Carlyle: A History of the First Forty Years of his Life, by J. A. Froude. London, 1882.

I decided not to open the parcels containing these letters. But I was gradually led by many facts to the conviction that Mr. Froude had distorted their significance, and had given a view of the relations between Carlyle and his future wife, in essential respects incorrect and injurious to their memory. I therefore felt obliged to read these letters, which I have done with extreme reluctance, and with reverential respect for the sacredness of their contents. The conviction which determined me to read them was confirmed by the perusal.

The question then arose whether further publication of them was justifiable for the sake of correcting the view presented by Mr. Froude. The answer seemed plain, that only such of these letters, or such portions of them, as had not any specifically private character could rightly be printed. I have therefore printed comparatively few of Carlyle's letters to Miss Welsh, while, in an Appendix to Volume II., I have tried to set right some of the facts misrepresented by Mr. Froude, and to show his method of dealing with his materials.

CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS,
July 1886.

MEMBERS OF CARLYLE'S FAMILY.

JAMES CARLYLE (born at Brownknowe, near Ecclefechan, August 1758; died at Scotsbrig, 22d January 1832) married, 5th March 1795, MARGARET AITKEN (born at Whitestanes, Kirkmahoe, Dumfriesshire, 30th September 1771; died at Scotsbrig, 25th December 1853.

The following is a List of their Children:—

THOMAS, born 4th December 1795; died at Chelsea 5th February 1881.

ALEXANDER, born 4th August 1797; died in Canada 30th March 1876.

JANET, born 2d September 1799; died 8th February 1801.

JOHN AITKEN, born 7th July 1801; died at Dumfries 15th September 1879.

MARGARET, born 20th September 1803; died 22d June 1830.

JAMES, born 12th November 1805.

MARY, born 2d February 1808.

JANE, born 2d September 1810.

JANET, born 18th July 1813.

} These still survive
(July 1886).

LETTERS
OF
THOMAS CARLYLE

I.—To Mr. THOMAS CARLYLE, Edinburgh.

From his FATHER.¹

ECCLEFECHAN, 27th April 1814.

DEAR SIR—I received yours yesterday and

ERRATA

Vol. I., page 56, line 3, for vacation, read vocation.

„ „ 191, „ 5, „ Frances, „ Francis.

„ „ 333, „ 4, „ esoteric, „ exoteric.

----- of the long correspondence between Carlyle and his family. [My Father] “wrote to me duly and affectionately while I was at college. Nothing that was good for me did he fail with his best ability to provide.”—Reminiscences, i. 58.

² Carlyle's next younger brother. What “Dr. Thom's Mob”

LETTERS
OF
THOMAS CARLYLE

I.—To Mr. THOMAS CARLYLE, Edinburgh.

From his FATHER.¹

ECCLEFECHAN, 27th April 1814.

DEAR SIR—I received yours yesterday, and was very glad to hear that you were well and was teaching, for we did not know what to do, whether you were coming home or going to stop at Edinburgh; the reason of me not writing last time the Carrier came out—Sandy²

¹ This letter is apparently the earliest that has been preserved of the long correspondence between Carlyle and his family. [My Father] “wrote to me duly and affectionately while I was at college. Nothing that was good for me did he fail with his best ability to provide.”—Reminiscences, i. 58.

² Carlyle's next younger brother. What “Dr. Thom's Mob”

was summoned about Dr. Thom's Mob; he was libeled with thirteen pages of paper written about the business. Dr. Henderson and Tom Minto were likewise summoned, and Peggy Kerr; there being no proof against Sandy he of course was discharged from the Bar. Dr. Henderson was fined £20 and one month's imprisonment; Minto, £10 and two week's imprisonment; Peggy Kerr, £5. We were all in confusion on Saturday getting witnesses to prove Sandy not guilty, and after all our labour the witnesses would not do without your Mother was there also; then she had to get ready for setting off on Monday, which she did with great difficulty, having to take Jenny and Peggy with her. You may think whether that would put us past writing or not. The Carrier is for coming off on Monday; but I thought that would not do for you [which] caused me to write this in the meantime and enclose this, and I will send your things with the Carrier. In the meantime I think these two guineas will was and what share, if any, the boy Sandy had in it, there is now no telling.

clear you. As I am in haste I will add no more at present. Mention in your next if you got the Single Note with the Box, etc.

JAS. CARLYLE.

II.—To Mr. ROBERT MITCHELL, Linlithgow.

EDINBURGH, 30th April 1814.

DEAR MITCHELL—You are perhaps thinking by this time that I am slow in answering your long-solicited letter ; and before going further, I must beg pardon, and plead the trite excuses of business, indolence, etc. etc.—and let me tell you, you have been such a notorious offender in that way yourself, you can't have the impudence to make any complaints.

Were I disposed to moralise, there is before me the finest field that ever opened to the eye of mortal man. Nap the mighty, who, but a few months ago, made the sovereigns of Europe tremble at his nod ; who has trampled on thrones and sceptres, and kings and priests, and principalities and powers, and carried ruin and havoc and blood and fire, from Gibraltar to Archangel—Nap the mighty is—GONE TO POT!!!

“I will plant my eagles on the towers of Lisbon. I will conquer Europe and crush Great Britain to the centre of the terraqueous globe.” I will go to Elba and be coop'd up in Limbo!!! But yesterday, and Boney might have stood against the world; now “none so poor to do him rev'rence.” “Strange,” says Sancho Panza, “very strange things happen in the boiling of an egg.” All those fine things, however, and twenty thousand others have been thought and said by everybody who thinks or speaks upon the subject—and so I leave them.

Having got out of this rhapsody, I now proceed to consider the contents of your letter. It gives me the sincerest sorrow, that you did not accomplish that redoubtable undertaking in which you were engaged.¹ There is a real pleasure attends those same castles which all of us so often build, and though, "like the baseless fabric of a vision," they must "all dissolve and leave not a rack behind," still there is enjoyment while the illusion lasts. The trisection of an angle by simple geometry is a complete wild-goose chase, at any rate, and in it disappointments must be relied on. Still your achievement (even had it come that length) was but like the drop in the bucket to some of my projected exploits. 'Twas but the other day, for instance, that I had got into a sure and expeditious way of boring a hole, right, slap, souse down through the centre of the earth we my poor cranium that I believe it was as effectually deranged by Leslie's Geometry as ever the valiant Knight of La Mancha's by Amadis de Gaul. In short, I believed it was destined for me to solve the problem of the trisection of an angle. I'll not tell you how many solar revolutions were performed whilst I was possessed with this Mathematical frenzy. Need I tell you how long after midnight I watched my armour of scale and compasses,—how often I believed that I had wrought the doughty deed, and secured to myself the applause of a wondering world? Truly I might be denominated the Knight of the Rueful Countenance, when I returned to curse the hour in which I undertook the desperate enterprise. I am now content to read Sharp's Sermons, the Border Minstrel, and even the Confession of Faith!" inhabit, and receiving point blank the productions of New Zealand and the South Sea!!!!

¹ Mitchell, in his letter (from Linlithgow, 9th April) to which this is an answer, had written as follows. The passage is characteristic, and shows his liveliness of spirit and his studious bent: “For three or four days I was idle; but idleness is the inlet to every mischief. The wildest notion that ever entered into mortal man’s brain took such possession of

As I will be in Edinburgh at least part of the summer, I cannot but highly approve of the plan you proposed of sending our essays to be remarked on by each other. It is impossible that it could do any harm: and since it would afford a very useful exercise at least, it would, I am convinced, be a very profitable way of carrying on our correspondence. I shall expect, therefore, in a few days to receive, per Carrier, a paper of yours to peruse, and directions how to proceed, with regard to time, etc. etc. Don't be particular as to the choice of a subject—any will do. It is very likely that I may send you some Mathematical thing or other, seeing I have got Bossut's History of Mathematics at this time, where perhaps there may be something new to you;—and again, I stumbled the other night upon a kind of a new demonstration of Pythagoras' square of the hypotenuse; and if you don't find it yourself (most likely you will), I will send you it too. We need be at no loss for subjects, literary, metaphysical, mathematical, and physical are all before us. I am sure this would be a very good way of spending part of the summer; and you who are the projector will surely never draw back from what you yourself proposed, and therefore will not fail to send me your production the very next opportunity.

Firmly had I resolved, on the faith of your recommendation, to read Thaddeus,¹ and you may believe me, when I declare that it was not for want of exertion on my part that I have not seen it yet. The truth is, I am acquainted only in one circulating library, and there Thaddeus has always been "out." Getting a book from a strange library is a little troublesome, and thus expecting every day to get it from that where I am known, I made no effort elsewhere. However, I will have it read, if possible, before I address you again—which, if you stick to promises, will not be long.

By the way, you have heard of Dr. John

¹ Miss Jane Porter's high-flown romance of Thaddeus of Warsaw, published in 1803, but still, in 1814, much admired by young people.

Leyden,¹ the unfortunate author of Scenes of Infancy, etc., from (I believe) Roxburghshire, who went to India and met an untimely end.

Leyden, a shepherd wails thy fate,
And Scotland knows her loss too late.—Hogg.

Well, if I am not much deceived, you will thank me for transcribing the following poem of his, composed on (Wellington, then) Wellesley's victory at Assaye, while Leyden was in India. I met with it in The Spy, a kind of periodical thing published the other year in Edinburgh.

Shout, Britons, for the battle of Assaye ;
For that was a day,
When we stood in our array,
Like the Lion's might at bay ;
And our battle-word was Conquer or Die.

Rouse, rouse the cruel leopard from his lair,
With his yell the mountain rings ;
And his red eye round he flings,
As arrow-like he springs,
And spreads his clutching paw to rend and tear.

¹ Leyden died in 1811 ; his memory is kept alive by Scott's sympathetic biography of him—one of those biographical sketches which give a high impression alike of its subject and its author.

Then first array'd in battle front we saw,
Far as the eye could glance,
The Mahratta banners dance,
O'er the desolate expanse,
And their standard was the leopard of Malwa.

But when we first encountered man to man,
Such odds came never on Against Greece at Marathon
When they shook the Persian throne,
'Mid the old barbaric pomp of Ispahan.

No number'd might of living men could tame
Our gallant band that broke Through the bursting clouds of smoke,
When the vollied thunder spoke,
From a thousand mouldering mouths of lurid flame.

Shout, Britons, for the battle of Assaye ;
Ye who perished in your prime,
Your hallowed names sublime,
Shall live to ceaseless time,
Your heroic worth and fame shall never die.

Can anything be grander ? what fire ! what energy ! If there is anything in existence that surpasses this, it must be Hohenlinden—but what is like Hohenlinden ? Tell me in your next what you think of this piece. Is not, think you, “From a thousand mouldering mouths of lurid flame” misprinted somehow ? Would “smouldering” do any better ?

Do not neglect to write to me immediately, and send me your essay—no matter what about. Tell me too, how you come on in your sermon ; mine (“good easy man”) is not begun, and I don’t know when it will—but I have a long year before me, till it be required.

I have thus, my dear Bob, sent you a sheet filled with very close and small letters, as you desired, and whether there be anything in it or no, still it is full. Pay me directly, I repeat it. Meantime I am, till I hear from you, my dear sir, yours truly,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Have you read Shakespear? If you have not, then I desire you, read it directly, and tell me what you think of him—which is his masterpiece. He is always excellent.

The following passage from Carlyle’s Reminiscences, vol. i. p. 89, illustrates the preceding letter and those which immediately follow :—

“It was now the winter of 1815. I had myself been in Edinburgh College ; and above a year ago had duly quitted it ; had got (by competition at Dumfries, summer 1814) to be 'Mathematical Master' in Annan Academy, with some potential outlook on Divinity as ultimatum (a rural 'Divinity Student' visiting Edinburgh for a few days each year, and 'delivering' certain 'discourses'). Six years of that would bring you to the church-gate, as four years of continuous 'Divinity Hall' would; unlucky only that, in my case, I had never had the least enthusiasm for the business (and there were even grave prohibitive doubts more and more rising ahead): both branches of my situation flatly contradictory to all ideals or wishes of mine; especially the Annan one, as the closely actual and the daily and hourly pressing on me, while the other lay theoretic, still well ahead, and perhaps avoidable. One attraction, one only, there was in my Annan business. I was supporting myself (even saving some few pounds of my poor £60 or £70 annually, against a rainy day), and not a burden to my ever-generous father any more; but in all other points of view I was abundantly lonesome, uncomfortable, and out of place there; . . . in short, thoroughly detested my function and position, though understood to be honestly doing the duties of it; and held for solacement and company to the few books I could command, and an accidental friend or two I had in the neighbourhood (Mr. Church and his wife, of Hitchill; Rev. Henry Duncan, of Ruthwell, and ditto; these were the two bright and brightest houses for me. My thanks to them, now and always!) As to my schoolmaster function, it was never said that I misdid it much ('a clear and correct' expositor and enforcer); but from the first, especially with such adjuncts, I disliked it, and by swift degrees grew to hate it more and more. Some four years in all I had of it; two in Annan, two in Kirkcaldy (under much improved social accompaniments); and at the end, my solitary desperate conclusion was fixed, That I, for my own part, would prefer to perish in the ditch, if necessary, rather than continue living by such a trade :—and peremptorily gave it up accordingly.”

III.—To Mr. ROBERT MITCHELL, Linlithgow.

MOUNT ANNAN, 18th October 1814.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—When I look at the date of your last elegant and endearing letter, I feel a throb of something approaching to remorse for the suspicion of ingratitude and inconstancy which you (if you thought of me at all) must have entertained of me, for my apparently unaccountable neglect of a correspondence which I had been the first to solicit, and the most eager to cultivate. I hope, however, that when you shall have heard “the story of my woes”—that is, my history for the last four months, you will be ready to grant me your forgiveness, and to receive me once more into your good graces.

Some three or four days after I received your lucubrations, an advertisement appeared in the newspapers for a Mathematical Teacher in the Annan Academy ;—the place is worth about £70 a year—and is respectable enough ; my friends, therefore, were anxious for my becoming a candidate. Having been favoured with a letter of recommendation from Mr. Leslie,¹ I did apply, and was informed that the candidates must undergo a comparative trial at Dumfries in the course of a few days, and that, in course, I must repair thither. Not to detain you with all the tribulations and heart-burnings I went through, it will be sufficient to inform you that I and another man having been examined by Mr. White,² I was preferred, and told I must enter on my office next day. This, you see, was quick work—but you have not heard all. General Dirom came to reside at Mount Annan towards the end of June, and two of his boys, learning Greek, Latin, and Mathematics, were consigned to my care. You can conceive the hurry and trepidation attendant upon obtaining and entering upon a new situation. You can conceive me just thinking of a subject for a reverie for your perusal, and a new engagement knocking all my reveries on the head, and telling me that for four months I must lead the life of a Mill-horse—you can conceive all this, and can you help pardoning me? The truth is, scarcely a day these three months has passed over my head, but I have reproached myself for ingratitude to my friend, to the companion of my studies, my speculations and perpendings (sweet bygone times!); and, strange as it may seem, every day I have again put off. “Procrastination is the thief of time,” and I am persuaded that nothing but the fear of your quitting my correspondence in disgust could have aroused me. I have at length determined, “though it were when I should sleep,” to write you—and here am I scribbling away at midnight your most humble servant.

¹ The eminent John Leslie, Professor of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh.

² Thomas White, Rector of the Academy at Dumfries, an excellent mathematician.

My dear Mitchell, I entreat you to sustain this excuse, for indeed none of the circumstances are exaggerated,—and to rest assured that the friendship of a son of genius, of similar pursuits, of kindred sentiments, and congenial spirit with myself, is too highly prized to be even apparently neglected, except upon the most imperious necessity. Believe me I shall be most unhappy if this excuse don't satisfy you, and will come under any terms rather than forfeit my right to a letter directly. After this long preamble you are not to expect that I, all jaded as I am, can even attempt to amuse you this bout, but, my dear Boy, send me a letter informing me that you are reconciled, and I'll warrant you receive a letter full of quirk and oddity, covered thick and threefold with mirth—humour—WIT, and the several other appendages requisite for forming an unexceptionable morçeau d'eloquence et d'esprit: but at present 'tis out of the question to expect anything more spirited than a last will, or more witty than a Methodist tract. But let me get forward as I may.

In seriousness your Mathematical investigations are excellent. Your demonstration of the property of the circle is really neat (I at least should think so, for on reading your enunciation I set to work and brought out a demonstration of the property, which I was both disappointed and pleased to find the SAME AS YOURS): but it is the trisection of the arc that I admire; it is indeed acutely and beautifully handled. "But thereby hangs a tale." I did not tell you that when I left Edinburgh for Dumfries I put your paper in my pocket—and whilst my right worthy compagnons de voyage (for I came in the Mail from Moffat) were sunk in politics, post-horses, farming, etc., I took out my friend's theorem, and leaving the base clod-hoppers to welter on among drains and dunghills and bullocks and balances of power, I entered Dumfries wholly disengaged from sublunary things; and well-nigh persuaded that an angle might be trisected. I went next morning to breakfast with Mr. White, and in the course of our conversation, happening to mention the trisection of an angle, "I have in my pocket," said I, "the result of an ingenious young friend and fellow-student's attempts on that subject. 'Tis here." Mr. W. had no sooner cast his eye upon your diagram than, starting up and uttering a wildly-accented “aye!!” he left the room. He soon dissipated the mystery by returning with an armful of dun aged manuscripts; he desired me to look at one of them, and I was surprised to see the same property. He complained bitterly that Mr. Leslie had showed it you and never mentioned his name! I assured him that it was an original on your part; but in vain. “’Tis impossible!” was his reply: I could not but feel rather vain, that I had a friend who had found out properties of which a veteran like White was proud.

By the way, could not we, think you, contrive to continue this mode of interchanging our lucubrations? ’Tis a project I like vastly, and from which I had promised myself much instruction, as well as entertainment. I have on hand (I should rather say in head) an explanation of the rainbow, together with some other bagatelles which I could send you—if I could think of any mode of conveyance. Could you devise no plan of regular communication? In Winter, at least, they could be conveyed to and from Edinburgh, free of expense, in some honest student's box. Let me have your ideas on the subject. Our college comrades, honest Davie, and the son of cat-gut—where are they? I had a hint, and only a hint, that Davie had beaten his forceps into pitch-forks,—and his scalpels into pruning-hooks—that is to say—had commenced plough-man. Pray tell me is it true? And has Andrew quitted Corstorphine?

.

What Books have you been perusing? and how did you like Shakespeare? Since I saw you I have toiled through many a thick octavo—many of them to little purpose. Byron's and Scott's Poems [I have read] and must admire,—though you recollect, we used to give Campbell a decided preference, and I still think, with justice. Have you ever seen Hoole's Tasso? I have among many others read, it, Leonidas, the Epigoniad,¹ Oberon,² Savage's Poems, etc. Miss Porter's Scottish Chiefs, and Waverley have been the principal of my Novels. With regard to *Waverley*¹ I cannot help remarking that in my opinion it is the best novel that has been published these thirty years. The characters of Ebenezer Cruickshanks mine host of the Garter,² the Reverend Mr. Goukthrapple and Squire Bradwardine display a Cervantic vein of humour which has seldom been surpassed—whilst the descriptions of the gloomy caverns of the Highlands, and the delineations of the apathic Callum Beg and enterprising Vich Ian Vohr, show a richness of Scottean colouring which few have equalled. Give me your opinion of it if you have read it;—and if not—endeavour by all means to procure it.

¹ A happily forgotten Epic by a Scotchman, Dr. William Wilkie. Hume professed great admiration for it, and Carlyle may have read it as a patriotic duty.

² Doubtless Sotheby's version of Wieland's Oberon.

My sermon is pretty much in the same style as yours was at the date of your last letter—with this difference—I don't know quite so well in what part of the Bible it is. My sentiments on the Clerical profession are like yours, mostly of the unfavourable kind. Where would be the harm, should we both stop? "The best concerted schemes o' mice an' men gang aft aglee!" I intended to have said something of the bigoted scepticism of Hume—but as I am convinced you see through his specious sophisms and detect his blind prejudice in favour of infidelity, I shall defer it. At any rate I have not room, and therefore must wait.

¹ Waverley was published in 1814.

² Not of the "Garter," but of the "Seven-Branched Golden Candlestick."

Now, my dear Bob, let me see you behave as you ought, and send me a long letter, and I promise it shall be answered punctually if I keep my health. In sooth, I shall expect an answer to this Chaos of a letter (which hurry, etc., and your good-nature will excuse) within fourteen days from the date hereof; so be punctual.

Pray do write me directly an account of all your transactions, adventures, misfortunes, loves, and hates. I am close upon the bottom of my sheet, otherwise I would say some fine thing on the "Charms of Friendship;" but I trust, my dear Mitchell, we can both feel the joys arising from the commerce of kindred sentiments and congenial minds.

Direct to me at Annan Academy—quick.

Need I add how sincerely I am, my dear
Mit., yours,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

IV.—To Mr. ROBERT MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

MOUNT ANNAN, 24th October 1814.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—Nothing could exceed my pleasure at receiving your obliging and entertaining, though laconic epistle. I hope, however, I need not tell you that the foolishness of your letter was not the cause of my long silence. You should know enough of me by this time, to be aware that your letter was altogether according to my heart and fancy,—and accordingly I had, the other day, written a right dolorous and woe-be-gone memorial, in which I humbly showed, that I had been over head and ears in business—that adventures and misventures and trials and tribulations had so crowded upon me that my sap and substance was evaporated; I represented—but what matters what I represented—since with all its stains and blotches on it you will assuredly see it—after it shall have performed the tour of Scotland, for (O luckless man!) it was sent off to Linlithgow last Wednesday, exactly the day before I heard from Little Johnson (Corrie) that you had come to Ruthwell! “Say shall thine anger then abate, upon consideration of egregious ink-shed?” . . .

So Andrew is still at Gogar. I join right heartily in your short but fervent petition for his consolation. Davie and I, after convoying [you] that day on your way to Lithgow—struck across the fields and paid him a visit, and after considerable trouble were admitted into his grotto or cavern or CRUI.¹ The most considerable of his movables were a chair wanting a back, a joint-stool, eight potatoes, and a pot of brimstone: but to give you any idea of the situation and contours of this den,—to represent to you the stern and doughty appearance of its innocent inhabitant,—much more to make you sensible of the “rancorous compound of villainous smells” that on all sides

¹ Sty, hog-pen.

“offended nostril,” is impossible. The tout-ensemble was dank and dreary, and

Dark as was Chaos e’re the infant Sun was roll’d together,
Or had tried his beams athwart the gloom profound.

And yet Andrew, good easy man! shrugging up his shoulders, told us “he was living like the ancients.” With all his oddity he is a good, honest lad. And Davie too! Well, peace be with ye, good kind-hearted souls!

Clint, poor man, hath taken unto himself a wife, and at this time sojourneth in the ancient burgh of Lochmaben. Hill is at Middlebie, in statu quo; and James Johnstone is lately returned from the Selkirk hall. Alas! poor creatures, we are all dispersing towards the four winds of heaven—and embarking on life’s wide ocean—and how shall we each steer his little bark through all the shoals and hurricanes that lie before us, where so many stately Gallies have foundered on the passage! ’Tis a bleak look-out, my dear Mit.—but though the greasy sons of pudding may pass us by with all the conscious dignity of beings of a higher and a fatter order, yet however humble be our lot,

'tis comfortable to think that—

Justum et tenacem propositi virum,
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instantis tyranni Mente quatit solida . . .
Si fractus illabatur orbis Impavidum ferient ruinæ.

But truce! whither am I running? let us quit moralising.

If ever you receive that 'foresaid stray-epistle you will see that even while I thought you at Linlithgow, I had not quitted the plan of interchanging the results of our speculations, —and you may easily imagine, I will not relinquish my expectations of your concurrence with my proposals now that you are within seven miles of me. In truth, I think it could not fail of being advantageous and entertaining to us both. What do you think of it? Have you any articles of the spin-brain manufacture by you at present? For me, poor soul, I have been kept like unto a cock-on-a-spit these four months, with hardly time to breathe, much less to think. Take an instance,—I am at this present—cold stormy midnight—scratching and writing what I at times think you will consider a letter—with a nose, saving the mark, I daresay as blue as indigo, and I do say as cold as an icicle,—with the consoling reflection, however, that when I do get to bed I shall not be disturbed till six in the morning. How can I think? But let not this interrupt your communications; General Dirom will be away in the course of four weeks or so, and then I shall have more time.

Mr. Duncan left Mount Annan this morning; and having invited me to Ruthwell Manse—you may expect to see me in the course of a week or two some Saturday afternoon, when, my dear Bob, we shall talk over our bygane days o' auld lang syne, and perhaps have another bout at PERPENDING. Tuesday must bring me a letter brimful of all things—or else—for now you are in my debt. Let me have all your theories and trials and temptations and hypotheses. Are you disengaged on Saturdays? for if I should come out and find you—But lo! I am at the bottom of my paper—and right fortunate is it for both—for in sooth so cold and *kierstless*¹ am I,—in a short time I should have been absolutely preaching. I will not ask your pardon for this motley farrago,—rejoice it is not worse. Write me as punctually at the day appointed, as punctually as it is in human nature to write—pass not sentence of excommunication on me—and be assured, I remain, my dear old Mit., your sincere friend (and semi-frozen servant),

THOMAS CARLYLE.

.

V.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 11th January 1815.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—I must send a cover to a long farrago of stuff, and in order to save appearances, and to avert the dire threats of bonds and imprisonment which you so liberally deal out in your last letter,—I have sat down to give you an account of my life and conversation since I saw you last. Nothing material

¹ Spiritless, inert.

happened to me in town after your parting from me,—and except purchasing Campbell's Poems, and transacting quelques petites affaires which it is needless to trouble you with, and getting my lungs well-nigh suffocated with the foul air, and the tympanum of my ears nearly torn to pieces with the war-whoops of the Edinburgh *Hogmanay*¹-night, I might have been said to be stationary. On Sunday morning I left Edinburgh on the outside of the coach, like you, in the gayest humour in the world, but before riding half a dozen miles the “biting breezes” of the East began to disturb me, and notwithstanding the consolation I derived from a shaggy greatcoat, and from comparing the dread-nought appearance of our guard (who to a natural obesity of body altogether hyperbolical, had added the adventitious aids of 2738·5 cubic inches of solid cloth and leather in the form of a tremendous impenetrable roquelaure, and surmounted the whole of this terror-striking apparatus with an awful broad-brimmed hat:—displacing as he stood not less than twelve solid feet of air) with the pitiful woe-worn visages of two fellow-travellers, whose livid noses and rattling teeth proclaimed (one would have thought) that the hour of their dissolution was at hand,—notwithstanding all this, by the time we reached Hairstones, I was right thankful to get inside of the “leathern-conveniency,”—where I continued all the way to Moffat. I made shift to fall into a kind of torpor whilst travelling down the Tweed—at least to shut my eyes upon the bleak and barren uniformity of its ash-grey hills, till on our vehicle’s suddenly stopping, I thrust out my head, and descried Tweed Shaws. Recollecting your and my horrid circumstances a few days before, I could not help silently ejaculating a fervent prayer that I might never again be under the necessity of passing a night in the residence of the men of Tinwald, nor of ever passing another instant of my existence with the RED CUDDY¹ of Moffat. But my paper is almost done, and only half my journey completed. “Brief therefore will I be.” I left Moffat at midnight in the Glasgow mail—and having arrived at home at about four o'clock—proceeded to Annan on Tuesday morning—safe and sound after all my perils and tribulations. If you can draw any “soul-comforting reflections” from this, much good may they do you—and meantime I remain, your (servant to command),

¹ The last day of the year.

¹ Cuddy, diminutive of Cuthbert = jackass.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

2 o'clock Thursday morning.

VI.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 25th March 1815.

MY DEAR BOB—At sundry times, and in divers ways, I have pondered upon a project I had formed of sending you a letter to arouse you, if possible, from the state of torpor in which, of late, to my unspeakable regret your faculties were benumbed. You are obliged to me for my intentions, and though tribulations of various sorts have prevented me from putting them in execution, you are not the less obliged on that account. You are a happy fellow, Mit., to be allowed to sit under your vine and under your fig-tree, quietly ruminating on your thirty-nine articles, with none to make you afraid. And how could you be so cruel as to mention those heart-breaking discourses? How, or when, or wherewithal are they to be made! In sobriety, that putting off, and that dissipation of studies is a serious evil. A thousand times have I lamented that hop-skip-and-jump disposition of mine which is perpetually prompting me to fly off at a tangent from whatever I am engaged in. Your “auricular confession” owns the same propensity; and I begin to think it is a fault of every mind—which effort alone can cure. I could be metaphysical perhaps, but you will be better satisfied with an example: It was but yesternight that I, your most obedient servant, became all at once sensible of the importance of present time, and having brought out my accoutrements, set right doughtily to the composition of my Exegesis. I began with alacrity of soul, and had finished the fourth line when I made a—dead halt! One cannot long be idle—you will not wonder that I took up the first book that came in my way—and though it was the dullest of all dull books, yet by a fatality attendant on those things, I could not give it up. It purported to be a "history of a lover," showing how Cecilia (somebody), being poor but honest, went to Paris with some Brandy Irish Dowager (of Tipperary), and was much astounded at their goings on, yet very much liked by the beaux. Showing how after divers trials and temptations she married with a lord (something) who had been a very great rascal in his early days, but was now become a most delectable personage; how they lived in great harmony of souls, till the honest man riding one day on some wold, and happening to fall from his beast in presence of this notable lady, she fell into hysterics or convulsions, and was taken home in a woeful plight, where she loitered on till she was "brought to bed," when she took her leave of the good-man and all the world. Would you believe me, I read and read this horrid story, and might have been reading yet had not a most dolorous ode to Matrimonial—no "Monody on the death of a beloved, etc." compelled me to throw past the book, and set to writing you a letter. Tell me not again of "Jacks-of-all-trades," you are a King of a student compared with me.

You are charitable enough to suppose that my head is full of ideas; your good-nature misleads you. I have indeed had ideas, and strange ones too, since I wrote you; but like many other remarkable ideas, they have had the fortune to evaporate as soon as produced. Mathematics I have absolutely never thought on, excepting some trifles from the Ladies' and Gentlemen's Diary, which I shall have conscience enough not to trouble you with at present. Great and manifold are the books I have read since I saw you. You recommended Thaddeus of Warsaw long ago, you may remember,—and the work in my judgment fully deserves it. Miss Porter has no wit, she invariably bungles a picture of the conversation of ordinary persons whenever she attempts it. Why does she delight in unfolding the forward weaknesses of the female heart, and making even Mary Beaufort love first? Yet with all her deficiencies she is interesting: never failing to excite our sympathy, though she cannot rank with our Fieldings or Smolletts. She infinitely surpasses the insipid froth of

“The mob of Gentlemen, who write with ease.”

As an extraordinary instance of perseverance, I must mention my having read Cicero de Officiis.¹ You must read it too, Bob; you will get through it in a week, and cannot think your time misspent. It consists of letters addressed to his son, and if we compare the steady, affectionate, unbending precepts of the venerable Roman with the only work of a similar kind in our own times, Chesterfield's

¹ Carlyle seems to have been reading a good deal in Cicero about this time. In a letter written in April of this year to his friend Thomas Murray, he says: “But the book I am most pleased with is Cicero, de Finibus; not that there is much new discussion in it, but his manner is so easy and elegant; and besides, there is such a charm connected with attending to the feelings and principles of a man over whom ‘the tide of years has rolled.’ We are entertained even with a common sentiment; and when we meet with a truth which we ourselves had previously discovered, we are delighted with the idea that our minds are similar to that of the venerable Roman.”

Advice, we shall blush for the eighteenth century!

But the most extraordinary production of any I have seen these many days, is La Pucelle d'Orléans, an Epic by Voltaire. This Mock-Heroic illustrates several things. First, that the French held Voltaire a sort of demi-god; secondly (and consequently), that they were wrong in so doing; and thirdly, that the said Voltaire is the most impudent, blaspheming, libidinous blackguard that ever lived. As proof of the first take the following specimen of French ingenuousness, from the preface by the Editor. After affirming that the poem is Voltaire's, he observes that "Personne n'a été la dupe du desaveu qu'il a fait de ce poëme, dans une lettre à Messieurs de l'Académie Française. Sa véracité est connue depuis longtemps. Tout le monde sçait, qu'affirmer ou nier, selon les temps, les lieux, les convenances fut toujours une de ses maximes favorites; et en vérité, un homme aussi extraordinaire, doit bien avoir des principes qui lui soient propres." Happy great man! Peace be to him and his "principes qui lui soient propres!" An epigrammatist sagely remarks—

"C'est du Voltaire—et tout est beau, Tout plait chez lui, jusqu'au blasphème."

To illustrate the third proposition—take any part of the poem—it is infinitely inferior in point of wit to Hudibras—yet were we not continually shocked with some indecent, vicious, or profane illusion, it would not be unentertaining. There is a description of the Temple of Fame, something in the spirit of Swift, which I would send had I room. The following [is a] new representation of the miseries of the builders of Babel—

"Sitôt qu'un d'eux à boire demandait, Plâtre ou mortier d'abord on lui donnait."

Add that it is professedly intended "pour les jeunes demoiselles." I most heartily "wish them luck o' the prize, man!" I have also read—but hold thy hand thou wayward mortal! consign not to the flames this ill-fated scrawl!—it is egotistical, it is nonsensical—and I speak it with a sigh—it is dull! Yet burn it not—if a condition bordering on coma, if an endless series of misfortunes and south-west winds which have almost obliterated my spirit, cannot excuse me, think for thine own sake—is there not many a dulcet precept still slumbering at the bottom of my inkhorn, which it will do thy heart good to receive? Think and read!—Which of ye, ye long-headed ones of the earth, ever dreamt that little Nap, tired of fretting out his heart in Elba, would rise Phoenix-like, disdaining “the limits of his little reign,” and once more front the world—determined to die “with harness on his back!” Your calculations are ruined, for Nap is on the field! And now poor d—I, when so many men that wield sceptres and paving-shovels—when so many people that have diadems and gridirons are combined against thee—why should I be thine enemy? No! fight thine own battle, and come what speed thou mayest for me. And yet I fear, my little fellow, thou art upon slippery ice, still thou hast many a trick, and with more truth than it was ever said of another, may it be said of thee,

“Ton âme impie, inflexible, implacable,
Dans les enfers vaudra braver le Diable !”

VOLTAIRE.¹

But I must finish this badinage—and assure you, my dear Mit., that I never was more serious than when I add that I am yours most sincerely,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

If you don't write, sir, instantaneously—it is almost two o'clock, and I writing the most confounded nonsense merely to provoke an answer—if you fail, I can't tell what to do with you.

Direct to me at James Gass', Cabinet maker, Edmond St. For among my other adventures it was destined that I should quarrel with a Lancashire Jackall, which Mr. Kennedy keeps by way of house-keeper, and consequently shift my lodgings. Adieu, my dear Mit. Write immediately.

¹ “In the name of wonder,” wrote Mitchell in his reply to this letter, “why did you fill your letter with such blads [Anglice, big pieces] of French? Besides the enormous difficulty of translation, it keeps out some of your own jeux d'esprit, which are much more palatable to my taste than any from the philosopher of Ferney.”

VII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 24th May 1815.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—You ought to thank me for not writing you sooner. Buffeted as I have been, without ceasing, since I saw you, by innumerable squadrons of blue demons, my imaginations have been only the decoctions of ill-humour, and my letter must have been either a hyperbatavian tissue of dulness, or a string of complaints and imprecations unfit for the perusal of any person, more at ease in body than a gouty valetudinarian, or in mind than a great man on his way to Botany Bay. Not that the case is mended. Winds and rains, and crosses and losses have reduced a temper, naturally warm, to a state of caustic irritability, that renders me unfit for anything. “How weary, flat, stale, and unprofitable, seem to me all the uses of this world!” For, what are its inhabitants? Its great men and its little—its fat ones and its lean? From the courtier to the clodhopper—from the emperor to the dust-man—what are they all? Pitiful automatons—despicable Yahoos—yea, they are altogether an unsufferable thing. “O! for a lodge in some vast wilderness, some boundless contiguity of shade, where” the scowl of the purse-proud Nabob, the sneer and strut of the coxcomb, the bray of the ninny and the clodpole, “might never reach me more!” But truce to this philippic,—vexations like these affect only the poor, misguided, wandering misanthrope; and (bless thy stars, my good Mitchell) thou art not of them.

The first article in the last Quarterly Review is on Stewart’s second volume.¹ The wise men of London are earnest in their censures of “the metaphysical heresies” of their northern neighbours; and notwithstanding the high admiration they pay to Stewart’s talents, they differ from him in almost all his results, because they disbelieve his principles—the “first principles” of Dr. Reid. Their opinion (and they give no reasons), on a point of this nature, is of little consequence. All the prejudices natural to

¹ Dugald Stewart’s Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind.

Englishmen they entertain in their full extent, and always modify their decisions accordingly. For my part, though far be it from me to attempt to disparage or vilipend this great man, I cannot help thinking that the perusal of his book has done me hurt. Perpetually talking about analysing perceptions, and retiring within one's self, and mighty improvements that we are to make—no one knows how,—I believe he will generally leave the mind of his reader crowded with disjointed notions and nondescript ideas—which the sooner he gets rid of, the better! I know you think differently; but de gustibus non est disputandum; and very probably, the fault is not with our Author, but his subject. . . . Guy Mannering is reviewed in the same number. Though we have still more reason to question their competency here, you will probably admit that “the Dutch boors of Mannering though never so well painted, must cause a class of sensations different from those excited by the Salvator banditti of Waverley.” Yet the only extract they give (the departure of the gypsies and Meg Merrilies' address to Ellangowan) is very much in the Salvator style.

I am glad you saw Lara, and am indebted for your account of it. I read the review of it in the Quarterly Review some time ago. Lara, it seems, is the identical Conrad, and Kaled no other than that same "dark-eyed slave," Gulnare, of whom such frequent mention is made in "The Corsair." The story appears to want éclaircissement. What could become of the madcap Knight? And what was the meaning of that carcase in the river? Why did he raise the war-whoop in the lobby? Your solution of the last difficulty is too general; besides, had he really been an-hungered, the natural remedy was to visit the pantry.

I am highly indebted to you for Hume. I like his Essays better than anything I have read these many days. He has prejudices, he does maintain errors,—but he defends his positions with so much ingenuity, that one would be almost sorry to see him dislodged. His essays on "Superstition and Enthusiasm," on "The Dignity and Meanness of Human Nature," and several others, are in my opinion admirable both in matter and manner, particularly the first, where his conclusions might be verified by instances with which we are all acquainted. The manner, indeed, of all is excellent; the highest and most difficult effect of art—the appearance of its absence—appears throughout. But many of his opinions are not to be adopted. How odd does it look, for instance, to refer all the modifications of “national character” to the influence of moral causes. Might it not be asserted with some plausibility, that, even those which he denominates moral causes, originate from physical circumstances? Whence but from the perpetual contemplation of his dreary glaciers and rugged glens, from his dismal broodings in his long and almost solitary nights, has the Scandinavian conceived his ferocious Odin, and his horrid “spectres of the deep”? Compare this with the copper-castle and celestial gardens of the Arabians—and we must admit that physical causes have an influence on man. I read The Epicurean, The Stoic, The Platonist, and The Sceptic under some disadvantage. They are perhaps rather clumsily executed—and the idea of David Hume declaiming, nay of David Hume making love, appears not less grotesque than would that of [seal covers] or [seal covers] dancing a French cotillon. As a whole, however, I am delighted with the book, and if you can want it, I shall moreover give it a second perusal. I have got to the end of this rambling letter, and I think in rather better spirits than I commenced. Why did you not write me again ere this? You knew my woful plight, and ought to have had compassion on my infirmities. To make amends, I allow you a week, and within that time you are to send me a most spirit-stirring epistle. Abuse me, if you will, for my vagaries, only be pithy, and be speedy too.

I am confidently informed that the man of music, Andrew, is still bent upon exploring the new world. Nay, it is stated by his intended comrade (who has now wisely preferred making wheel-barrows at Castle-Milk, and living as his fathers did, to going to labour he knows not where, and feed upon he knows not what) that

Andrew's accoutrements—his box—was on its way to Greenock a fortnight ago ! The Yankees are long-headed personages, and Andrew is a simple man. But he can fiddle, he can dig, and to beg he is not ashamed. You know what you must do, Bob, before Thursday first—be pithy—nothing but pepper and salt will suit me in my present humour.—My dear Mit., ever yours,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

VIII.—To Mr. ROBERT MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 14th June 1815.

MY DEAR BOB—Your letter of the 31st May gave me a great deal of pleasure. I had heard a sort of vague account that you were sick ; and I had formed the project of coming up to condole with you, when (it seems) you had so much need of condolence, buffeted as you have been by “ennui, torpor and hepatitis.” It made me happy to learn that you had come to a “quietus”—and the only remark I shall make on the subject is—be thankful that such moderate allowances of "Leech's bolus" were able to produce the effect—for there are froward creatures in the world, to make whose "quietus" defies the power of anything less efficacious than "a bare bodkin."

You take it upon you to scold me for not calling as I went to Dumfries. But hear my story, Mit. I was proceeding quietly from Ecclefechan to Annan, without the smallest intention of going on any such expedition, when I met with Johnstone, and he advised me to accompany him. We were obliged to use all possible despatch for fear of being too late; and (before we got Jeffrey accoutred at Floss, etc. etc.) it being about eleven o'clock, I had absolutely no time to see you, though I certainly intended it when I left Annan. Indeed, I did see from the road, a tall lank figure performing its gyrations round Ruthwell Church with much solemnity: but whether it was Mitchell, I know not. It was near two when we got to Dumfries—and being consequently prevented from getting within half a league of St. Michael's—we saw the ceremony of laying the stone,¹ exactly as well as if we had been in the grand square of Timbuctoo. Yet notwithstanding this—notwithstanding that all the scullions in Dumfriesshire were “let slip,” notwithstanding the cantering and parading of the Ettrick Yeomen, notwithstanding the paper caps, the figured roquelaures, the magic-lanterns of free masonry, it was a striking scene. Scotland paying the tribute of well-earned honour to one of the noblest of her sons. It is a great pity that the monument will not be over his grave; many inconveniences ought to have been submitted to in order to gain this point. When I passed Ruthwell again, it was after midnight, so that you have nothing to blame me for on that score.

I could not send you the Review, for the man of whom I had borrowed it had got it again, and lent it to another. If I can get it again at any time, I will send it you. Have you seen the last Edinburgh Review? There are several promising articles in it—Scott’s

¹ The foundation stone of the monument to Burns.

“Lord of the Isles,” “Standard Novels,” “Lewis’ and Clarke’s Travels up the Missouri” (of which a most delectable account is given in the Quarterly), “Joanna Southcott,” etc. etc. I have been revising Akenside since I saw you. He possesses a warm imagination and great strength and beauty of diction. His poem, you know, does not, like Campbell’s “Hope,” consist of a number of little incidents told in an interesting manner, and selected to illustrate his positions,—it is little else than a moral declamation. Nevertheless I like it. Aken-side was an enthusiastic admirer of the ancient republics and of the ancient philosophers. He thought highly of Lord Shaftesbury’s principles, and had a bad opinion of Scotsmen. For this last peculiarity he has been severely caricatured by Smollett in his Peregrine Pickle, under the character of the fantastic English doctor in France. When we mention Shaftesbury, is his book in your possession, and can you let me have a reading of it? I am inclined to suppose that the prevalence of infidelity is on the decline. Pride will often overturn what reason had attempted in vain, and when the carrion and offal of human nature begin to adopt the tenets of our sages, we look for something new. What leads me to say this is that I have heard lately that there are in Middlebie sundry cunning workmen, some skilled in the intricacies of the loom, some acquainted with the operations of the lapstone, who are notable deists—nay, several aspire to taste the sublime delights of Atheism! Now, when creatures superior in so few respects (inferior in so many) to the cow that browses on their hills, begin to tread upon the heels of the wise ones of the earth, the hue and cry about freedom from popular errors, defiance of vulgar prejudices, glory of daring to follow truth, though alone, etc. etc. etc., is annihilated, and “all the rest is leather and prunella.” But we will talk on those subjects afterwards.

Give my best respects to Mr. and Mrs. Duncan, and mention that I intend to have the pleasure of seeing them in a short time. I cannot come first Saturday for many reasons. I cannot come the next Saturday, for then is

Mr. Glen's¹ sacrament, and I believe I shall be constrained to go to sermon. There is nothing that I know of to hinder me the week after that, and if all things answer I shall likely see you then. Though I began this letter last night, I have been obliged to write the greatest part of it since twelve o'clock to-day. It is within three minutes of one—and I have no more time. Write me immediately and I will be punctual in answering. Your Irish play is an unique in its kind. I shall be obliged to you for your pun. I have never heard it. Keep Blair till I come and seek him—and believe me to be—my dear Mitchell, yours sincerely,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

IX.—To Mr. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 11th December 1815.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—I opened your last letter with fear and trembling. I expected

¹ In the Reminiscences, i. 107, is an account of Mr. Glen, "Burgher minister at Annan, with whom I had latterly boarded there, and been domestically very happy in comparison."

nothing but reproaches—when lo! my sins are laid upon the back of the unoffending Post-John, and I am never blamed. Indeed, Mitchell, you have been too good: and I look for nothing but that you will be ready to slay me when you come to know that I have never written you at all. I beseech you let not your wrath be kindled. Stay till you have heard my piteous circumstances—and I am persuaded you will pardon me. I might justly preface my account with an infandum regina, but to proceed without ornament. “Ye probably may not know those lines of Scaliger (applied to dictionary-makers, and mutatis mutandis to dictionary-users)—

Si quem dura manet sententia judicis olim

.

Lexica contexat, nam cætera, quid moror? omnes
Poenarum facies hic labor unus habet.”

You certainly imagine I am got terribly learned since I saw you. But fair and softly—I know nothing at all about honest Scaliger; and “those lines” of his are, I believe, none of the most honestly come by. I conveyed them (convey the wise it call) from Morell's preface to Ainsworth's Dictionary,—a preface, I may observe, the most strongly impregnated with pedantry of any I ever read. But once more let me proceed—"those lines of Scaliger" and many other "lines," are applicable to me—as you shall presently hear. After parting from you at Ruthwell I consumed the remainder of our vacation in sundry idle projects: one of which was—going to Dumfries, and suffering "the pain of three intolerable deaths" for the purpose of hearing certain wise and faithful counsellors display their eloquence at the circuit trials. When I returned to Annan, it occurred to me that it would be proper to see what had become of my Hall discourses. It occurred to me, much about the same time, that it would be proper to study Rumford's Essays, Mackenzie's Travels, Humboldt's New Spain, Berkeley's Principles of Knowledge, Stewart's Essays, Simson's Fluxions, etc. etc. It was some great man's advice to every person in a hurry—never to do more than one thing at a time. Judge what progress I must have made when I engaged in half-a-dozen. Manufacturing theses—wrestling with lexicons, chemical experiments, Scotch philosophy and Berkeleian Metaphysics—I have scarcely sufficient strength left to write you even now. Upon consideration, therefore, of these egregious labours—I hope, you cannot refuse to forgive me.

I am anxious to consult you about going to Edinburgh this winter. I have already partly told you that I have been making my Exegesis. It is now nearly finished ;—and truly a most delectable production it is—but of this some other time. I wrote to Murray in great haste, to commission me a day, and it seems, I am engaged to read on Friday the 22d current. So that you see my time of setting out is decided upon. You will ask me, why, since I have almost come to a determination about my fitness for the study of Divinity, why all this mighty stir—why this ado—about “delivering” a thesis—that in the mind’s eye seems vile, and in the nostril smells horrible? It is not because I have altered my sentiments about the study of Theology : but principally because it came into my head to try what sort of an essay upon natural religion I could make. I have tried, and find accordingly that I can make one perfectly—"weary, flat, stale, and unprofitable,"—but I am engaged, and must read it now. I do not expect yet that you will be able to tell me "whether the Sabbath is of divine institution"—but I do hope you have determined to go to Edinburgh this Winter along with me. If you have not I must not try to persuade you. You would suspect that my arguments arose from selfish motives,—and you would not be far from right ; for if you do not go, I shall be the most melancholy person imaginable. But I cannot help bringing to your recollection the possibility that you may change your opinion about becoming a clergyman, in which case your annual visit to Edinburgh will be of essential service. It does good, at any rate, by preventing that pity which certain people of grave minds are so disposed to bestow on every one that has not a fixed prospect in life ; and, over and above, it is pleasant to revisit one's alma mater. For these reasons, and for one (I confess it) as strong as any—that I shall be uncomfortable if you refuse—I earnestly wish you to determine upon this journey.

.

You would have Landalls preaching last Saturday. How does he seem to do? “Doctrinal discourses”—true blue—I suppose. I have heard of a criticism passed by the late Dr. Finlay of Glasgow upon some eminent probationer; I know not whether it will apply. Upon being asked his opinion concerning the gentleman's oratorical powers, he made answer—“He hath a comely appearance, and hath attracted the notice of divers young men—and also of some young women.” Have you heard that the very learned and very orthodox divine of Ochiltree is preparing to apply his polyglot stores to translating the New Testament—Bonum, faustum, felix et fortunatum sit; I am only sorry that I was obliged to become a subscriber—it is one pound four—if you take a thought of buying it, apply to me, and you shall have it for the odd silver.

I am obliged to you for your account of your Swiss visitants. With all imaginable deference to those who practise the sublime virtue of charity—I cannot altogether see what concern the peaceable inhabitants of Dumfriesshire have with the management of the convents situated among the glaciers of the Alps. Had the task of repairing their breaches been consigned to the virtuosi and the cognoscenti that frequent those regions, it might have been more befitting. But “all for the honour of England!”

Can you tell me whether Davie Graham is continuing to practise physic? He is a good honest lad;—I am only afraid that the aphorisms of Celsus will not answer [for] the men of Tundergarth.¹ And Andrew!—alas! the green ocean is betwixt us! Illi robur et aes triplex circa pectus erat.

The fate of poor Andrew disposes one to be melancholy. What is to become of us, Mitchell? The period of our boyhood is past: and in a little while, if we live, behold we shall be bearded men! from whom wisdom and gravity will be required. It is now a year since we last visited Edinburgh. For my part, though I have laboured as I could in my vacation, can I say that I am either wiser or better in any perceptible degree? Out upon it! This is a miserable world.

¹ A parish in Dumfriesshire.

But let us quit moralising, and bethink us of our journey. You must write me on Thursday, that you will be ready at the time. I cannot think of any excuse you can plead with any chance of success. Are you afraid lest it hurt your health? Wrap yourself up in your roque-laure, and you can take no harm. You have been curling; and I am happy to believe, you have got round again. You certainly will come. I know not whether you will have heard that I am living with Mr. Glen since I came to Annan last. He is a real good man, as far as I can see; and Mrs. Glen is a fine cheerful woman,—so that upon the whole, I am not uncomfortable in my present circumstances. Most of the ministers that come here (no great number, let me be thankful) are curious bodies;—but I will speak of this elsewhere. In the meantime I must again repeat my petition—and hope that in a short time we shall be in Edinburgh together. —I am ever yours, my good Robin,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

“About Christmas time (1815),” writes Carlyle in his Reminiscences (i. 92), “I had gone with great pleasure to see Edinburgh again, and read in Divinity Hall a Latin discourse—‘Exegesis’ they call it there—on the question, ‘Num detur religio naturalis?’ It was the second, and proved to be the last of my performances on that theatre. My first, an English sermon on the words, ‘Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now,’ etc. etc., a very weak and flowery sentimental piece, had been achieved in 1814, prior to or few months after my leaving for Annan. Piece second, too, I suppose, was weak enough, but I still remember the kind of innocent satisfaction I had in turning it into Latin in my solitude, and my slight and momentary (by no means deep or sincere) sense of pleasure in the bits of ‘compliments’ and flimsy ‘approbations’ from comrades and Professors on both these occasions. Before Christmas Day I had got rid of my Exegesis, and had still a week of holiday ahead, for old acquaintances and Edinburgh things, which was the real charm of my official errand thither.”

X.—To Mr. ROBERT MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 15th February 1816.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—I know I should have written you a month ago, and I am not going to take up your time with excuses. I have indeed no excuse, except the perpetually forthcoming one—no time and no subject; and it would be but aggravating my misconduct to harangue you upon a topic that has been so fully discussed by every writer of letters in every age of the world. The truth is—I have been a very torpid person of late. After undergoing the fatigues of a most uncomfortable journey to Edinburgh, I returned with renewed keenness to my old habits of seclusion and repose; to reading when I was able, and when I was not, to the forming of vain hopes and silly projects, at which I have a peculiar knack. But though I have not written to you, I have had you often in my mind. Many a time during my dreary pilgrimage to Edinburgh did I solace myself with the hope of making you merry with the recital of my adventures: a hope which (as you are just going to see) has, like many other hopes, proved utterly fallacious.

I left Ecclefechan on the evening of Tuesday the 19th December on the top of the

Glasgow mail. Little occurred worthy of notice, till on my arrival at Moffat I discovered among my fellow travellers, along with three Lancashire cotton men, a fine species of the popinjay—of whom, all that I can now say is, that he was much shocked at seeing ‘roos-beef fo suppa,’ and expressed his grief and surprise by several nondescript interjections ; that he was unable to determine whether the fowl on the table was a tame duck or wild, and thereupon “did patiently incline” to the reasonings of an ancient Scottish gourmand who at length succeeded in settling his mind upon this important subject ; and that upon my inquiring after the news of the paper which he was reading, he informed me that the Aachdooos had returned to England, and that (this he preluded by three nods of satisfaction) the Prince Regent was gone to Brighton.

The next day I had different objects to speculate upon. I was mounted on the roof of the coach in one of the most dismal days I ever saw. It snowed heavily ; on our arrival at Erickstane particularly, the roaring of the wind and the ocean of drift carried with it, together with the bellowings of the distracted coachmen, and the outlandish warwhoops of two Irish doctors, who, along with myself, had dismounted till we should ascend the hill, formed a scene sufficiently wild. Of this I intended for your benefit, a very pathetic description,—as well as of the desolation of the Broughton Inn, where after a day of violent struggling we finally stopped. The kitchen, I remember, when I entered it, was filled with shepherds and carriers, and in the midst, like a breathing iceberg, stood our guard, describing with much emphasis the hardships of the day. Two female passengers had taken possession of another quarter of the house, and left the two Hibernians and me to pass the evening as we best were able. I did not by any means like my comrades. One of them (according to my conceptions)—but that he from time to time uttered certain acute sounds, and had a pair of little fiery eyes,—pretty much resembled an Egyptian mummy—a little meagre thing—skin apparently of the nature of parchment, and a complexion that seemed to have been produced by repeated immersion in strong decoctions of logwood. The other had a Kilmarnock bonnet. Both seemingly exceeding vain as well as stupid. I spent an unhappy evening. The mummy blew upon a German flute, and both talked of Antrim and Drogheda, till I had come to a resolution of leaving them next morning at all hazards. I must not neglect to tell you of our dormitory;—finding there was only one bed allotted to us all, and wisely judging it prudent to make the best of a bad bargain, the mummy took possession of the middle. There is no happiness, it is said, without alloy,—at least it proved so in this case; for although by this manœuvre the mummy received a comfortable proportion of warmth, yet the pressure of the Kilmarnock-bonnet-man upon his fragile sides seemed considerably to damp his enjoyment. It became at length so intolerable, indeed, as to compel him (after a desperate and ineffectual effort at release) to exclaim “Marciful Heaven preserve my sowl—what will become of me now?” The bitter whine in which this sentiment was uttered, and the sudden nature of such a preparation for dissolution (which, I might have inferred from the words, he expected forthwith) would in any other circumstances have overcome my gravity.

I left them next morning and set out on my forlorn expedition at four o'clock. It was truly an Icelandic scene. The wind had subsided during the night—all was silent—and the moon disclosed the dreary expanse of snow, which in many places was drifted into heaps of several feet in depth. I made but indifferent progress,—for after infinite flounderings (at one time literally up to the chin in snow) the sun rose upon me in the wolds of Linton. The track was entirely obliterated—and I suppose I was beginning to look silly enough, when I luckily descried a benevolent herdsman, who pointed out to me the road for Noblehouse,—from which I had deviated at the suggestion of a roadman, at whose cottage I had called, and who thought the higher road would be the clearer. I was glad to meet, at Noblehouse, with a Thomas Clark, Divinity student, whom I had known in Edinburgh. He was preparing to mount on horseback, and in the meantime introduced me to a tall thin man, who, he said, intended to walk to Edinburgh, having been long disappointed of a passage in the coach. There was a stagnant placidity in this person's countenance, which inclined me to believe that he would prove a sufficiently inoffensive companion. He did turn out a very shallow man. He questioned the workmen whom we passed, with much minuteness, concerning the state of the rods that were before us; and conversed with me upon no subject but that of the effects of snow upon human bodies,—seeming particularly anxious about the fate of his own vile carrion. He tired; and I left him at Pennycuick sitting with a kindred spirit, to all appearance a Peebles weaver. I pursued my journey with unabating velocity, and arrived at John Forrest's at last about nine o'clock. I never was more happy at seeing Edinburgh.

I gave in my Discourse next day along with Samuel Caven and another whom I did not know. It was sustained without difficulty.

Caven's was a precious morsel. Its author, it seems, is in some family in the East Country. He is a jumbling person to speak with; he says "an infinite deal of nothing; his reasons are as two grains of wheat hidden in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them, and when you have them, they are not worth the search." But enough of him. Our old college cronies have left Edinburgh nearly to a man. Waugh still continues there teaching and learning with all his might. I think he was not quite so full of calculi as usual. When we speak of calculi, I brought home [some] mathematical books, which I must tell you of. Bossut's History of Mathematics, Wood's Optics, and Cunn's Euclid and Newton's Principia constitute my stock of this sort. I got Lucan's Pharsalia also, and some little extracts of Fenelon's Dialogues des Morts. If there are any of these (except Newton, for which you would be obliged to wait awhile) that you wish to see—they are ready for you. I had read Bossut before—and have not done much at him of late. Neither have I read any quantity of Wood yet, having been nibbling at the Principia (which with all my struggling, I come but ill at understanding—indeed in some places I don't understand it at all) ever since I came home. Of Lucan I have not read above seven lines. I saw Scott's Waterloo and Guy Mannering when I was in Edinburgh. The former has been so dreadfully abused already, that I have nothing to add to the newspaper puns, etc., with which it has been assailed. There are (as Gray said of The Castle of Indolence) some good lines in it. I have far too little room for speaking of Mannering's beauties and defects at present. I will discuss it next time I write, if I can find nothing better.

But I must close this long letter. I have, as you see, devoted the night to writing my adventures. You asked for *Cuddies*¹ and truly I think I have driven you in an abundant herd. There is still another person whom (if he continues thus) you may think it reasonable to add to the list. I beseech you give him quarter.

¹ "You must write me on your return from Edinburgh, conveying the Doctor's criticism, and your adventures with all the red Cuddies you may meet with."—Mitchell to Carlyle, 15th December 1815.

Notwithstanding my misdeeds, I will ask you for a letter—and a pretty early one too. You used yourself to be a sad correspondent you know, and ought therefore to have some conscience. I saw Landalls to-night—he says you have been unwell. I do hope, my good Mit., you are recovered. Tell me soon—and believe me ever, my dear Robin, yours sincerely,

THOS. CARLYLE.

XI.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

19th April 1816.

MY GOOD LAD—You must be aware that I have a right to rate you with considerable acrimony. Last time I saw you, you promised to send me a letter in a few days, yet several weeks have elapsed, and no letter has appeared. This is very blameworthy, but I need not scold you, for, in all probability, by the time you have studied the following disquisition—you will think yourself punished to the full. It is one of the theorems we were speaking of. I found it out some months ago; and an odd fancy struck me of turning the demonstration into the Latin tongue. My dialect of that language is, I doubt not, somewhat peculiar—and you may chance to find some difficulty in interpreting it. [Here followed the theorem in Latin.]

Such is the result of this investigation. Your theorem about the heptagon does not answer exactly: it is only a good approximation, as I perceive, and as you may perceive also, by consulting a table of sines and tangents,—I have forgot West's theorem about the circle and curves of the second order. It is no great matter surely, since I should not be able to demonstrate it, though I had it. I wish you would send it me notwithstanding.

I hope you have sustained no injury from your excursion to Edinburgh. I hope, too, that you spoke to Mr. Leslie concerning the books. If you have not procured [me] one, I must request you to lend me yours immediately for a short time, if you can do without it: for one of the boys has begun conics and I have lent him my book—and should like to have another copy of it by me, to consult at home. You must send me the theorem and book by Mr. Johnstone of Hitchill—who I understand is to be at Ruthwell to-day and who can easily bring them to Annan. A letter I am expecting with impatience. Yours ever,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

.

XII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 15th July 1816.

MY DEAR FRIEND—I am greatly obliged to you for your letter. At present I had no great reason to expect it. Yet you must not suppose that I have wilfully neglected to write. It is two months since I set resolutely to work, determined to send you a very handsome letter without loss of time. And I had assuredly done so, had I not clearly perceived that it was not in my power to send you anything that could at all have interested you. Since that time I have been continually loading myself with unavailing reproaches ; and I have begun to write at last, solely, lest by my silence I should offend you without remedy. You are therefore to expect nothing but a very useless letter from me ; and dull as may be.

I am very sorry that you are so unhappy—it is my own case also, for I have been extremely melancholy during the last six weeks, upon many accounts. It is about ten days since I got rid of a severe inflammation of the throat, which confined me to the house for two weeks. During two or three days I was not able to speak plainly, and you will easily conceive that I passed my time very heavily. I endeavoured to read several things : I tried a book of modern Biography, The British Plutarch ; but soon finding it to be a very miserable book, I shut it for good and all. I next opened the Spectator—and though his jaunty manner but ill accorded with my sulky humours, I toiled through a volume and a half with exemplary patience. Lastly, I had recourse to Lord Chesterfield's advice to his son ; and I think I never before so distinctly saw the pitiful disposition of this Lord. His directions concerning washing the face and paring the nails are indeed very praiseworthy: and I should be content to see them printed in a large type, and placed in frames above the chimney-pieces of boarding schools, for the purpose of enforcing the duties of cleanliness upon the rising generation. But the flattery, the dissimulation and paltry cunning that he is perpetually recommending, leave one little room to regret that Chesterfield was not his father. Such was the result of my studies, in my sickness;—a result highly unfavourable to those feelings of prostration before high birth and weight of purse, which (many tell us) it is so eminently the duty of all men to cultivate. Indeed this is not the first time that I have noticed in my mind a considerable tendency to undervalue the great ones of this world. Conscious that this sentiment proceeds in a considerable degree from my situation in life, I sometimes endeavour to check it: but after all, it requires little observation to teach us that the Noble of Political society and the Noble of Nature are different persons, in nine cases out of ten. I am also aware that Flaccus has said that "Principibus placuisse viris, non ultima laus est;" but with great deference, I would submit to Flaccus, that the justness of his aphorism must depend upon the character of these same "Principes viri;" otherwise—it is easy to conceive a state of society, in which this non ultima laus of his must be very liberally shared with sycophants and pandars. But, I daresay, you have enough of these reflections. Turn we to something else:—I daresay I know as little of Navigation as you; and yet I do not feel great difficulty in explaining how Hamilton Moore¹ "resolves triangles on the surface of a Sphere into plane triangles." Hamilton Moore, honest man, gives himself no uneasiness about resolving his triangles—he takes them as he finds them—and considering them as plane triangles—solves his problems very comfortably. (I believe Leslie has a note in his Trigonometry, explaining the method of reducing the angles of a spherical triangle to the plane triangle formed by its chords). I readily agree with you that Moore's rules are very defective :—his remarks are often quite stupid—for instance, his statement (noticed by Humboldt) that the attraction of a boat to a ship, or a ship to a rock, is caused by gravitation. A similar phenomenon may be witnessed by causing two pieces of wood to float on a bowl of water—and all men know that it is caused by capillary attraction. I have never seen Keith's Trigonometry, and therefore cannot tell you anything about it. I am glad to hear that you are getting forward so well with Homer—I know almost nothing about him—having never read anything but Pope's translation, and not above a single book of the original, and that several years ago. Indeed, I know very little of the Greek at any rate. I have several times begun to read Xenophon's Anabasis completely ; but always gave it up in favour of something else. You complain that nothing that you do leaves a vestige behind it ;—what do you make of

¹ The nineteenth edition of John Hamilton Moore's Practical Navigator was published in London in 1814.

Homer? For my part—I cannot well say what I have been about since I wrote to you last. Out of a considerable quantity of garbage which I have allowed myself, at different intervals, to devour, I have only to mention Crabbe's Poems as worthy of being read. In addition to great powers of correct description, he possesses all the sagacity of an anatomist in searching into the stormy passions of the human heart—and all the apathy of an anatomist in describing them. For the rest—I continued reading Newton's Principia with considerable perseverance and little success,—till on arriving a short way into the third book—I discovered that I had too little knowledge of astronomy to understand his reasoning rightly. And I forthwith sent to Edinburgh for Delambre's Abrégé d'Astronomie, and in the meantime betook myself to reading Wood's Optics. I cannot say much about this book. Its author intermeddles not with the abstruse parts of the science,—such as the causes of reflection and refraction,—the reason why transparent bodies at given angles of incidence reflect their light almost entirely (concerning which I meet with many learned details in the Encyclopædia Britannica), but contents himself with demonstrating, in a plain enough manner, the ordinary effects of plane and spherical mirrors,—and of lenses of various kinds,—applying his doctrines to the explanation of various optical instruments and remarkable phenomena. But in truth, I know little about it; I read it with too great velocity. I also read Keill's¹ Introductio ad veram Physicam; but I shall let it pass till next time I write. In fine, Delambre arrived; and I have read into his fourth Leçon—and like it greatly. I intended to have told you some of his observations—but I would not overwhelm you with ennui all at once—and therefore I shall be silent at present. Ne quid nimis, as the proverb saith.

On Friday we enjoyed the society of Brother Saffery of Salisbury—a solicitor (of money) for the benefit of the Baptist Mission. I was rather disappointed in the appearance of this person. The name of a missionary suggests the idea of a lean and mortified ascetic—travelling with his staff and scrip—and with pious avarice, hoarding, for the behoof of his brethren, the scanty donations of a precarious charity. Brother Saffery was the reverse of all this; He arrived in a post chaise, and was a tall man of a florid complexion, and very great diameter. Nevertheless it was easy to see that his was no common character. His brow was knit together very gloomily—and his voice (naturally a deep-toned bass) was compressed into an inharmonious whine,—all denoting profound humility and passive obedience. He spoke of the designs of Providence and the projects of the Devil with great sang-froid; and quoted largely from the Scripture, backing his quotations with Wiltshire proverbs—and other baser stuff of his own composition. His conversation, you will easily believe then, was very oppressive. Indeed, so strongly did it savour of stupidity, if not of something worse, that I could not perceive it to be at all a pressing duty to put money into the hands of persons like him, for any purpose whatever. However, Brother Saffery had no great room for misguiding the talent committed to his care by the people of Annan;—inasmuch as said talent amounted only to two pounds four shillings and sixpence—a sum which, considering the trouble he put himself to, was trifling enough. It is pity that the missionaries cant so violently. There is no doubt that many of them are serious, well-meaning men—yet it would be too much to expect that, in such a number, there should not be several with whom the propagation of Christianity is far from being the primary object; and of the best it is to be regretted that their zeal is not tempered by a little more prudence.

¹ John Keill was Savilian Professor at Oxford from 1709 to 1721. He was a voluminous writer, and his works had value.

I had several other matters to write about; but my paper draws to a close. Yet I cannot forbear noticing that strange project of going to France, which you talk of. Possibly it might be extremely pleasant,—but there are many perplexing questions to be answered before it can be put in execution. First, how are we to get to France; second, how are we to live in France; and third, what good will living in France do to us. "Chill penury," my dear Mitchell, here as in other cases, represses our "noble rage" of visiting this country, and, may be, it is no great matter. For it may be doubted, one would think, whether a country inhabited by fierce revolutionists, and rascally marauders, and flimsy aristocrats—all sweating under a foreign and arbitrary yoke—would be a fit place for an honest man to dwell in—if he could help it. At any rate, it seems I am to stay nearer home for a while. For, you must know, I have received two letters from Professor Christison concerning the situation of Teacher to the Parish School of Kirkcaldy—or rather, I believe, assistant to the present teacher, who (being a very useless man) has agreed to resign upon consideration of being allowed to retain his salary—retaining also the name without any of the power of Parish Schoolmaster. I cannot say that I am violently taken with this offer. The emolument is rated about a hundred-a-year, but there appear to be some ambiguities about it which I do not understand; and I have written to them, that if they should like to wait, I could come to Edinburgh in Autumn, and talk with them about the place—and if they should not like to wait, that there would be an end of the matter. And there it stands. I wish you would send me as long a letter as this by this day week—I wish also that you would come down and see me—say on a Saturday when the tide is about mid-day, and then we might cross the water to Skinburness. Write soon—send me West's Exercise, that I mentioned last time—and believe me, dear Mitchell, yours ever,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

The project referred to in the preceding letter of leaving Annan and becoming master of the school at Kirkcaldy took effect. Carlyle in his Reminiscences, i. 98 sqq., gives an account of the circumstances of this change. Its first great result was the making friendship with Edward Irving. "Blessed conquest of a Friend in this world! That was mainly all the wealth I had for five or six years coming, and it made my life in Kirkcaldy (i.e. till near 1819, I think) a happy season in comparison, and a genially useful. Youth itself—healthy, well-intending youth—is so full of opulences! I always rather like Kirkcaldy to this day. Annan the reverse rather still when its gueuseries come into my head, and my solitary quasi-enchanted position among them,—unpermitted to kick them into the sea.”

XIII.—TO MR. ROBERT MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

ANNAN, 3d August 1816.

MY DEAR LAD—You will easily guess, by the speediness with which I have answered your letter, that I am anxious to be reinstated in your favour. We have indeed written to one another much too seldom of late. I suppose a good part of the blame is my own—but I will not take it all. Let us try to be more regular in future. I was at a loss what to make of the first part of your letter. I could have laughed at the causes which your sagacity has pointed out for the mistake, had I not been grieved at the mistake itself. You expect my explanation, but in truth I am unable to give any explanation of the matter. I am altogether unconscious of having mentioned any particular Saturday for our excursion; and had I done so, I cannot conceive how I should have hit on that day you speak of, for I must have known that the tide would not serve. If you have not destroyed that letter, I think you will find in it that I wished you to come on the first Saturday that would suit our purpose. But in reality it was late at night, or rather early in the morning, before I finished that immense epistle,—and I dare say I was half asleep over the latter part of it; and so I cannot vouch for its contents. But let us be of comfort. I have looked into the Belfast Town and Country Almanack—and consulted several cunning men on the subject,—and from all quarters I collect that the moon will be full about one of the clock on the morning of Thursday the 8th inst.—so that in all human probability—the time of full sea, next Saturday after that, will be between 1 and 2 o'clock;—a time that will answer our purpose very well. Now, if notwithstanding your late disappointment you could be induced to come to Annan about twelve o'clock that day—we could eat a morsel of dinner together—and forthwith embark for Cumberland. I am anxious that you should come—for I wish to see you; and this will be a pleasant enough way of spending the time; and besides it will do no harm to you—it may happen to be of service. Write on Tuesday if you can; and at any rate on Thursday, and let me know if you can come. . . .

I am very glad that you have met with a book of Natural Philosophy that you like. Send me your demonstration (or bring it) of the accelerated motion. I return always to the study of Physics with more pleasure after trying the “Philosophy of Mind!” It is delightful, after wandering in the thick darkness of metaphysics, to behold again the fair face of truth. When will there arise a man who will do for the science of Mind what Newton did for that of Matter—establish its fundamental laws on the firm basis of induction—and discard for ever those absurd theories that so many dreamers have devised? I believe this is a foolish question,—for its answer is—never. I am led to talk in this manner by having lately read Stewart's History of Philosophy in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica. I doubt I am going to displease you—but I must say—that I do not recollect of ever having bestowed as much attention with so little effect upon any author as upon Professor Stewart. Let me study his writings as I like, my mind seems only to turn on its axis,—but without progressive or retrograde motion at all. During these eighteen months, for example, have I been at times labouring to comprehend the difference between the primary and secondary qualities of bodies, and my labour has always been in vain. Can you resolve me this difficulty? I can easily see that heat (a secondary quality) has two meanings,—either it means the sensation in our mind—or it means the disposition of the particles of the body that causes this sensation: but is not hardness (and the other primary qualities) in the same predicament?

I designed to say many other things—but Post-John is about to set out—and I must hold my hand. Write me at the time I mentioned—and see if you can come at the time specified. I have many things to show you and tell you—and ask you. I remain, in the meantime (in great haste), my dear friend, yours truly,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XIV.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

MAINHILL,¹ 13th November 1816.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—I shall set out for Edinburgh to-morrow morning; and before going, I have begun (as in duty bound) to give you an account of my procedure. I have done nothing at all since I saw you, but put off my time. I was sick two or three days; and went over to Allonby to recreate myself. I returned from Allonby in three days, and remained mostly at home, waiting with patience for the day of my departure, which at length is near at hand.

¹ “He” [my Father] “became Farmer (of a wet clayey spot called Mainhill) in 1815, that so ‘he might keep all his family about him,’ struggled with his old valour, and here too prevailed.”—Reminiscences, i. 61. “About two miles distant” from Ecclefechan, “on the left hand side as you go towards Lockerby, there stands, about three hundred yards in from the road, a solitary low whitewashed cottage, with a few poor out-buildings attached to it. This is Mainhill, which was now for many years to be Carlyle’s home. . . . The situation is high, utterly bleak, and swept by all the winds. . . . The view alone redeems the dreariness of the situation.”—Froude, Life, i. p. 35.

I am glad you got on so well with your mathematics. Your demonstration of that theorem of West—about the triangle—which you sent me, is very simple and neat, much better than mine, as far as I can recollect. . . . I have got nothing to send you—of any use—unless you think of inserting¹ the following problem; which notwithstanding the technical jargon, with which it is enveloped, is after all a silly enough piece of work. You will perceive that it is a general solution of the problem, concerning a particular case, of which Mr. White was so facetious above two years ago. It is almost the only thing I have done since I saw you: and as I now write it out for the first time, I am not without apprehensions of errors in the computation, though sure enough of the principle. But if you propose it, I shall have time enough to give it a revisal before a solution is required. . . .

¹ Viz., in the Dumfries Courier, Mr. Duncan's newspaper.

. But here is Johnstone with intelligence that my intended compagnon de voyage cannot go to-morrow; and I must off in the coach to-night at six o'clock. "Night thickens, and the crow makes wing to the rooky wood." I have not a moment to lose. Good-bye, my dear Mitchell. You shall hear of me ere long.—

Yours ever,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XV.—To Mr. ROBERT MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

KIRKCALDY, 12th February 1817.

MY DEAR SIR—I yesterday received a letter from our friend Johnstone, who tells me that you are greatly astonished at my long silence. And in truth you have some reason, but you are wide of the mark in the hypothesis which you have formed to account for the phenomenon. I am certainly much dissatisfied with your conduct; but this could only have induced me to write with greater vehemence and celerity. The truth is, I began you a letter about three weeks after my arrival in this place, and had proceeded a great way—when some stupid business or other interrupted me; and the paper was thrown by for ten days. I began another with renovated zeal, and had actually got to the last page, when your letter from Edinburgh arrived—and struck me dumb with grief and surprise. I was in a sad taking. To think that my very last employment before leaving home was writing to you—that I had calculated the weeks and days that must elapse before the month of March could bring us together to hold a solemn conference touching all that should concern us; and then to hear in the midst of my calculations, that though during a fortnight you were within ten miles of me—that though in two hours from any given point of time you might have been transported to my habitation—you came not near me! It was a dog's trick, Mitchell. Little prevented me from throwing down my implements and crossing the salt sea to seek you,—had I known to what quarter of the great city my search must be directed. All that remained for me then, was, by writing a most abusive letter, to show you how much “the galled jade will wince." But alas! no sooner had I collected my energies for this enterprise, than a sore throat seized me—and (after a protracted struggle on my part) confined me nearly a whole week to my room. My heart died within me at the sight of the gargles and boluses and blisters with which I was assailed: and till two days ago, I was able to think of nothing but the sickness and sorrow to which mortal man is subject in this miserable planet. This is the reason of my silence. You will perceive that the blame rests with you and fortune. I am faultless—or nearly so. Still I am in a very considerable rage against you. Whether "mine anger shall abate" upon consideration of a long letter speedily sent me, I know not—but I wish you would make the experiment. Johnstone will have told you all about my condition and operations in this long and dirty town; and it would but fatigue you to repeat the statement. I am sufficiently comfortable; and feel considerably less spleen and ennui than I used to do at Annan. My habits have been so much deranged by change of place, that I have not yet got rightly settled to my studies.

I have read little since I saw you ; and of that little I doubt I have not made the best use. Have you seen Playfair's Introductory Essay in the Encyclopædia ? I am sure you will like it. It is distinguished for its elegance and perspicuity. I perused it some weeks ago, and thought it greatly preferable to Stewart's. Indeed, I have often told you that I am somewhat displeased with myself because I cannot admire this great philosopher half as much as many critics do. He is so very stately—so transcendental, and withal so unintelligible, that I cannot look upon him with the needful veneration. I was reading the second volume of his Philosophy of the Human Mind lately. It is principally devoted to the consideration of Reason. The greater part of the book is taken up with statements of the opinions of others ; and it often required all my penetration to discover what the Author's own views of the matter were. He talks much about Analysis and Mathematics, and disports him very pleasantly upon geometrical reasoning ; but leaves what is to me the principal difficulty untouched. Tell me if you have read it. You have no doubt seen the Tales of my Landlord. Certainly, Waverley and Mannering and the Black Dwarf were never written by the same person. If I mistake not, Dr. M'Crie's strictures are a little too severe on some occasions,—and his love of the Cameronians too violent. The worthy Doctor's humour is as heavy as lead. I am afraid you are tired of this.

It is very comfortable that you and Samuel Cowan go on so lovingly together. I am unacquainted with your lucubrations ; for I have not seen a Courier since I left Dumfriesshire. Long ago, when I was in Edinburgh, I had demonstrated a theorem for your behoof—but I have nearly forgot it now. I think it may be enunciated thus : “ If the diameter of a circle be divided internally and externally in the same ratio, the straight lines drawn from one of the points of section to the extremities of the chord passing through the other, will make equal angles with that diameter.” It bears some analogy to one of Mathew Stewart's. You will get the demonstration well enough. Johnstone tells me that Mr. Duncan has engaged a certain Mr. M'Diarmid to assist him in conducting the paper. I think I have heard of this person's speeches in the forum—and also that his wit was very great. I hope in his hand the torch of eloquence will burn bright—and shed a strong ray of intellectual light over the whole district.

I have not been in Edinburgh since you left it; and therefore I can give little news from that quarter. Your countryman Frank Dixon came into the town a few days ago; and I believe he intends to remain, if he can obtain employment.¹ He was in this place last week, visiting Edward Irving. He is a fellow of infinite jest, and spares no pains to keep his company in convulsions. A variety of works have been begun about the new year (as is the fashion) in the "periodical line." A weekly newspaper, the Scotsman, has reached the third number. I have seen them all—a little violent in their Whiggism; but well enough written in some places. Pillans and Jeffrey and Moncrieff and many others have been respectively named as the Editor. There is also a weekly essay, The Sale Room, begun about six weeks ago—by whom, I know not. The writers are not without abilities; but the last numbers seemed to indicate that the work was about to give up the ghost. I understand you had the famous Dr. Spurzheim¹ among you lately, examining the head of George Ross. What said the sage cranioscopist about this wonderful being? And what do you think of his doctrine of skulls? For myself—having never been within the sphere of his influence, there is little merit in being sceptical. I own his system seems to me to be a mass of crude hypotheses with a vile show of induction about it—calculated to impose only upon the lazy and wonder-loving. I say show of induction, for it seems from the nature of the case to require a number of experiments almost immense to establish any one of its positions. There are, it seems, three-and-thirty bumps upon the human headpiece, which the Doctor says are faculties. Now, any peculiar character may have originated from one of these, or from two or more of them, or from the whole together. Calculate the combinations that can be made of thirty-three bumps, and allow for the original constitution of the mind, and you will require, I believe, millions of instances to prove the title of one single bump to the name of organ. Tell me what you think of this.

¹ The readers of Carlyle's Reminiscences will recall the figure of this "Annandale Rabelais," "a notable kind of man, and one of the memorabilities;" "a most quizzing, merry, entertaining, guileless, and unmalicious man; with very considerable logic, reading, contemptuous observation, and intelligence, much real tenderness too," etc. etc.—i. 145.

¹ Spurzheim, originally a disciple of Gall, had come to England in 1813, when he was thirty-seven years old, full of enthusiasm to propagate his new doctrine of phrenology. He was received with especial favour in Scotland, and gained a large following there—among those whose heads were not as hard as Carlyle's.

I am very much afraid that you will think this letter dull—I think it so myself—but what can I help it? Be as content with it as you can. I am longing greatly to hear from you. Let me know all that you are reading and saying and thinking. Stand not upon ceremony, but send me a very long close-written letter, with all the speed imaginable. Remember me kindly to Mr. and Mrs. Duncan, and to all about the Manse that care for me. Write soon. Good-night, my old friend; I am in a hurry, for the post hour is nearly come.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XVI.—To Mr. ROBERT MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

KIRKCALDY, 31st March 1817.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—Certainly your letter ought to have been answered before this. But it seems to be the fate of all my lucubrations to be behind their time.' I have no excuse to offer, except, of course, no time and no subject,—and I need not aggravate my offence by taking up your time longer with discussing it. If you shall be graciously pleased to pardon me, I promise to behave in future as becometh me. I have nothing surprising to tell you. I myself am leading a quiet and peaceable life; and my neighbours, like every other person's neighbours, are exclaiming against the hardness of the times, and praising or blaming the proceedings of the Government, according as the late "strengthening of the hands of the Executive" happens to strike their mental optics. We had two lectures upon the pathognomy of Drs. Gall and Spurzheim lately. The cranioscopist was a Mr. Allen, a Yorkshire man, who has been expounding the doctrines of "chemical philosophy" amongst us for the last three months. He seems to possess talents,—but to be very much addicted to building hypotheses. On this occasion he had the honour of addressing all that was rich and fair and learned in the burgh. After considerable flourishing, he ventured to produce this child of the Doctor's brain—and truly it seemed a very Sooterkin.¹ I have since looked into the Doctor's book, and if possible the case is worse. Certainly it is not true that our intellectual and moral and physical powers are jumbled in such huge disorder ; surely it will be marvellous if these powers can be defined and estimated with such mathematical precision from the size and figure of the skull. It is very silly to say that Spurzheim has demonstrated all this ; Spurzheim has demonstrated nothing. For anything he knows to the contrary, the faculties of the soul are to be ascertained by the figure and size of the abdomen—if the venerable science of Palmistry is not to be revived. It is in vain to rail against the opposition shown to novelties ; the doctrine is not to be rejected for its novelty, but for its want of truth. Neither does it serve any purpose to tell us of the many ingenious persons who support it. A century has not elapsed since Dr. Berkeley wrote a book on the virtues of Tar-water, and the learned in Europe were loud in its praise : yet now tar-water is accounted vile. So it may fare with Spurzheim. Nevertheless Allen has converted the lieges of Kirkcaldy. So strong is the desire which we all feel of knowing the character, talents, and disposition of our neighbour, and so deep is the regret, that “Nature has made his breast no windores

¹ "It is reported of the Dutch women that making so great a use of stoves, and often putting them under their petticoats, they engender a kind of ugly monster which is called a sooterkin."—Note to Hudibras, part iii. canto ii. 146.—T. C.

To publish what he does within doors, etc.,” that (to say nothing of other inducements) craniology, if urged with a proper quantity of dogmatism, will find many believers. And why not? Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur.

I was in Edinburgh two weeks ago; but there was nothing worthy of notice taking place. I heard Leslie give a lecture on Heat: it displayed great ingenuity, but his experiments did not succeed. His Geometry is to be out in a few days. I intended to have enrolled in the Divinity Hall; but their Doctor was too busily engaged otherwise to attend to me.¹ He had been quarrelling with his students about the management of the library ; and the committee, which has been appointed to draw up regulations for the management of it, had that very day submitted them to the Doctor and his students assembled in the Hall. They gave much dissatisfaction to the Doctor, and immediately (as I was told—for I was not there) there was great confusion, and several speeches, vituperative and oburgatory, passed among them ; till at last the mutineers, to the number of fifty, adjourned to a neighbouring schoolroom, con strepitu, and valiantly drew up twelve resolutions proclaiming their grievances, and their determination to apply to the Presbytery for advice. The Senatus Academicus has since taken up the case ; and, as the committee appointed to decide on it consists of Meiklejohn, Ritchie and Brunton, it is easy to see how the affair will end. Your picture of this Hall, and the dudgeon it seems to have excited in you, gave me great amusement. I have not been within its walls for many months—and I know not whether I shall ever return, but all accounts agree in representing it as one of the most melancholy and unprofitable corporations that has appeared in these parts for a great while. If we are to judge of the kind of Professors we should get from the Edinburgh Kirk by the sample we already possess, it is devoutly to be wished that their visits may be short and far between. It may safely be asserted that though the Doctors Ritchie, junior and senior, with Dr. Meiklejohn, Dr. Brunton, and Dr. Brown, were to continue in their chairs, dozing, in their present fashion, for a century, all the knowledge which they could discover would be an imperceptible quantity—if indeed its sign were not negative. We ought to be somewhat sorry for the Divinity Hall; but our grief need not stop here. If we follow its members into the world, and observe their destination, we shall find it very pitiful. With the exception of the few whom superior talents or better stars exempt from the common fortune, every Scotch Licentiate must adopt one of two alternatives. If he is made of pliant stuff he selects some one having authority, before whom he bows with unabating alacrity for (say) half a score of years, and thereby obtains a Kirk, whereupon he betakes him to collect his stipend, and (unless he think of persecuting the School-master) generally in a few months falls into a state of torpor, from which he rises no more. If, on the other hand, the soul of the Licentiate is stubborn, and delights not to honour the Esquires of the district;—heartless and hopeless he must drag out his life—without aim or object—vexed at every step to see surplices alighting on the backs of many who surpass him in nothing but their love for gravy.¹ This is the result of patronage, and this is one of the stages through which every established Church must pass, in its road to dissolution. No government ever fostered a Church unless for its value as a State-engine, and none was ever ignorant of the insecurity of this engine till it is placed upon the rock of patronage. But it ends not here. Though all "constituted authorities" are ready to admit that Truth is great and will prevail—none have ventured to let their "true religion" descend unsupported into the arena, and try its hand at mauling the heresies which oppose it. On the contrary, every "true religion" is propped and bolstered, and the hands of its rivals tied up; till by nursing and fattening it has become a bloated monster that human nature can no longer look upon—and men rise up and knock its brains out. Then there is great joy for a season, and forthwith a successor is elected, which undergoes the same treatment—and in process of time meets with a similar fate. Such is the destiny of Churches by law established. Let every one of us be as contented with it as possible—and gird up his loins to attain unto a share of the plate, whilst the game is good.

¹ “Irving’s visits and mine to Edinburgh were mostly together, and had always their attraction for us in the meeting with old acquaintances and objects of interest, but except from the books procured could not be accounted of importance. . . . On one of those visits my last feeble tatter of connection with Divinity Hall affairs or clerical outlooks was allowed to snap itself and fall definitely to the ground. Old Dr. Ritchie ‘not at home’ when I called to enter myself. ‘Good,’ answered I; ‘let the omen be fulfilled.’”—Reminiscences, i. 115.

¹ “I would advise every young man” (says Dr. Goldsmith), “at his entrance into the world, to like gravy: I was once disinherited by an old Uncle for not liking gravy” (from memory).—T. C.

I am glad that you like Adam Smith. I agree with you very cordially, and regard him as one of the most honest and ingenious men of his age, or indeed of any other. He is one of the very few writers who have not gone delirious when they came to treat of Metaphysics. He wrote his Wealth of Nations in a room not a hundred yards from the place where I am sitting—and the men of Kirkcaldy are with reason proud to remember him. You view Lord Bacon with a different eye; and, without doubt, you have some reason to be scandalised at the admiration with which he is treated. It looks as if philosophers could not do without some one to worship. It is not long since they tumbled poor Aristotle from his temple—and it rests not with Playfair and Stewart, or Bacon would soon be exalted in his stead. I have read little of any consequence since I wrote to you. You will have seen the last numbers of the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews. In the latter, among a great deal of foul and nauseating stuff, I was happy to see that due credit is at last given to Mr. Duncan for his valuable institution.¹ I was reading Pascal's Lettres

¹ Mr. Henry, Duncan, the minister of Ruthwell, near Dumfries (born 1774, died 1846), to whose sons Mitchell was tutor, was a man of good sense and public spirit. He had established at Ruthwell "a Parish Bank for the Savings of the Industrious" (the parent of all modern Savings Banks);

Provinciales. None can help admiring his wit and probity. He sustains excellently the character of naïveté which he has assumed—and with infinite dexterity hunts the Jesuits through all their doublings and subterfuges, till he has triumphantly exposed the wretched baseness of their conduct. It is pity that the Salvation of Europe required the re-establishment of this vile order of men. Last week I perused Von Buch's Travels in Norway and Lapland. Much of his attention is devoted to Mineralogy, of which I am very ignorant, and his movements are sometimes not a little mysterious, from the want of a proper map of the country. Nevertheless he communicates some valuable information respecting the natural productions and the wandering inhabitants of those dreary regions. His manner is as clumsy and ponderous as that of German philosophers generally is, and nowhere is this more apparent than when he attempts to be striking, or tries his powers in the pathetic line. I took Bailly's Histoire and he had lately published an account of it, which was noticed with warm praise in the Quarterly Review for January 1817.

de l'Astronomie out of the College library last time I was over the Firth. [He seems] to write with great eloquence and perspicuity; but I have read little of him. We get a Dumfries Courier here amongst us. Our third number reached us a few days ago. It seems M'Diarmid is become sole Editor—it is not the opinion of the readers here that the paper has been a gainer by the change. The Ranger seems (under favour) to be but a silly kind of person—and his friend Mr. Bright is a very vapid gentleman. It is a pity that Spondastes¹ his labours have been curtailed before he has completed his investigations. But we must make a shift to live without knowing who wrote Mary's Dream. I expected to have seen Samuel Cowan's investigation last week—but it did not appear. If you have given over your Mathematics, well and good; but if you have not, you may throw the following exercises into your storeroom, if you like. [Here followed mathematical propositions.]

¹ "Little Murray," wrote Mitchell, 23d February 1817, meaning their common friend Thomas Murray, "has been writing in the Courier under the name of Spondastes. He gave an account of all the learned Gallovidians from the Creation of the World to the present day; and had not sheer modesty prevented him, himself would have been among the number."

And now, my beloved Mitchell, what more can I do for thee? My sheet is full—and if thou speak of *pica*¹—this is dense enough in all conscience. I do hope and trust I shall hear from thee very soon. I know I have been to blame—but that is past and gone. Therefore let us forget and forgive—and believe me, my dear Robin, yours faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XVII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

KIRKCALDY, 5th July 1817.

MY DEAR ROBIN—After waiting very impatiently for such a long period, I received with great satisfaction, the short but savoury morsel which thou hast at length been pleased to despatch me. It does not by any means quell my appetite ; but you assure me it is only a precursor, and what can I do but be “propitiated.” I turned pale when I noticed your charge of “palming.” The proposition about the harmonic section was, as I said before, included in one of Matthew Stewart’s problems,—the source, I suppose, from which Leslie himself obtained it. No doubt it was stupid enough not to know that it was deducible from Prop. 22, iii. of the Analysis, or still more directly from prop. 9, vi. Elements—and therein lies my error. The problem concerning the minimum was proposed last winter in Leslie’s class ; and I know not when or where or in what manner you and Waugh had discussed it. That “to find the locus of the vertex of a triangle given in species whose base is one of the sides of a given angle standing on a given straight line,” was also derived from one of Leslie’s. It seems to have no affinity with prop. 4, iii. Analysis. I suppose it has been wrongly enunciated to you. So that you see the quantity of palming has in this case been very inconsiderable. The same day on which I received your letter, I perused Alpha's Newspaper-solution. Edward Irving thinks it a learned investigation. I think so likewise. The very same result (for I tried it) is obtained, and by a nearly similar process, from the 32d prop. of Newton: but I do not understand your integral calculus. It would be a more difficult business to find the time of descent to the centre of the earth. I wish you would try this and send me your result. I am afraid I cannot do it.

¹ In the letter to which this is an answer Mitchell had written: "I have selected the largest sheet of paper I have in the world; my 'page' is sufficiently 'dense,' and my type a perfect pica,—all this that 'thine anger may abate.' What can I do more?"

Three weeks ago I finished M. Bailly's Histoire de l'Astronomie Moderne. His acquaintance with the science seems to have been more extensive than profound; his style is elegant—perhaps too florid, and interspersed with metaphors which an English critic might be tempted sometimes to call conceited. I wish I were an Astronomer. Is it not an interesting reflection to consider, that a little creature such as man—though his eye can see the heaven but as it were for a moment—is able to delineate the aspect which it presented long ages before he came into being—and to predict the aspects which it will present when ages shall have gone by? The past, the present, and the future are before him. Assuredly the human species never performed a more honourable achievement. “The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,” must disappear like those that delighted in them; but when the hand that wrote the Principia is reduced to a little black earth, and the spirit that dictated it is gone no one knows whither—the work itself remains in undecaying majesty to all generations. But Dr. Chalmers, it would seem, is fearful lest these speculations lead us away from Christianity, and has written a volume of Discourses to prove that the insignificance of our planet in the Universe is no argument against the truth of religion. Orthodox men declare, of course, that he has completely discomfited his opponents. I read it some time ago. It abounds in that fiery, thoroughgoing style of writing for which the Author is so remarkable; nevertheless his best argument seems to be, that as it is in the Scriptures, we have no business to think about it at all—an argument which was well enough known to be a panacea in cases of that nature before his volume saw the light. One is a little surprised to see the Doctor so vehement in his praise of Newton for what certainly was very laudable—his rejecting all manner of probabilities, and refusing to admit any hypothesis till it was supported by direct and uncontrovertible proof. Without doubt this answers exactly in the present instance, but if carried to its full extent on the other side, it will lead to alarming results. Christianity itself is only supported by probabilities; very strong ones certainly, but still only probabilities. But here, we are informed, it is necessary “to sit down with the docility of little children” and believe everything that is told us; which is a very comfortable way of reasoning. It is perhaps not surprising that the Author should be dogmatical; but it seems strange, when his own side of the question is so very evident, that he should deal so largely in denunciations against his adversaries. It is very certain that the unhappy sceptic cannot believe one jot the better, though he were brayed in a mortar. Yet almost all the writers on the evidences of Christianity that I have seen (excepting Paley) have treated him in this manner. These reflections occur naturally enough in perusing this book (which after all is no ordinary production, though better books have not always passed through six editions in so short a space); but I have not stated them often. When a poor creature's sentiments, in such cases, happen to be contrary to those of his neighbours, the less he says of them the better. This same Doctor, as you will know, writes the first article in the late Edinburgh Review—on the "Causes and Cure of Mendicity." After expatiating at considerable length upon the evils of pauperism, he proposes, as a remedy, to increase the number of clergymen. They who know the general habits of Scottish ministers will easily see how sovereign a specific this is. The remainder of the Review is good reading; but as you will have seen it before this time, I will not trouble you further on the matter. I have seen the last Number of the Quarterly Review. It seems to be getting into a very rotten frothy vein. Mr. Southey is a most unblushing character ; and his political lucubrations are very notable. He has been sorely galled by the Caledonian oracle, poor man. I know nothing about Mr. Duncan's controversy except through the Scotsman ; and they assign him the victory. I received about a month ago the Rev. William Thomson of Ochiltree's new translation of the Testament. Of course I am no judge of his "new renderings ;" but the style, both of writing and thinking, displayed in those parts which I have looked at, is dull and sluggish as the clay itself. He brags of having altered the expressions of the old translation—everybody, I suppose, will readily admit this, and be ready to wish him joy of all the honours that can arise from such alterations. I might say more of books, but this will abundantly satisfy you for one course.

I have heard nothing of Johnstone yet. Truly, I think, never any poor wight had two such lazy correspondents as I am yoked withal. Much might be said on this subject—but it is needless to punish you before the time. In four or five weeks I hope to be with you, and you shall hear your evil deeds [proclaimed] with energy enough. As I may reach Annandale by various routes, it will be an object of great importance to fix upon the best. Sometimes I am for proceeding through Peebles and the wolds of Selkirk by Polmoodie and Ettrick Pen. This track is almost as the crow flies. At other times I think of Tweedsmuir and Moffat; and at present Irving and a Mr. Pears (schoolmaster in this neighbourhood) are persuading me to accompany them by Stirling and the Trossachs to Glasgow.¹ They tell me we shall see Loch Katrine and climb Ben Lomond and do many other exploits;—but we have not yet counted the cost—and notwithstanding all that has been said about the sturdy independent feelings of a pedestrian, I am inclined to think that in my case they are greatly overbalanced by the more vulgar consideration of stiffened joints and blistered feet. Upon the whole it is not unlikely that I must again penetrate the moors of Tweeddale—a district which I never crossed except in the most woful plight both of body and mind—and which therefore I hate very cordially. At all events, I am to be three or four weeks beside you. I wish you would contrive some excursion for our mutual benefit. What say you of a sail to Liverpool? The expense would not be great—and it might tend to dissipate that headache which, I am sorry to find, still infests you. We could embark at Dumfries or Annan, and we could not fail to find a ship bound to some Scottish port whenever it should please us to return. We could go to the Isle of Man or to Wigtown or anywhither. If Johnstone would go with us, we should be three merry souls—wind and weather permitting. Write me your opinion of this project immediately—I had other things to tell you of—but daylight and paper are both failing me,—and this half-hour I have been driving my pen as fast as ever Jehu, the son of Nimshi, drove his chariot, to be in time for the mail,—and, after all, I am afraid that I am out. One thing I must mention. Write soon; call to mind thy engagements, and, to make the matter definite, I hereby give you notice that unless I receive a letter from thee within fourteen days from the date hereof (allowing three days of grace) thou shalt be punished as a *crack tryst*¹ and a breaker of promise, without benefit of clergy—so look to it. Thine old and faithful friend,

¹ Of this journey there is a lively account in the Reminiscences, i. 122-134.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XVIII.—To Mr. JAMES JOHNSTONE, Hitchill,² Annan.

KIRKCALDY, 25th September 1817.

MY DEAR JOHNSTONE—I fear you are already fretting at my silence; and, as I have no satisfactory apology to offer, it would but augment your dudgeon to attempt one. Therefore, without preface, I desire you to be content, and you shall hear all things in their order. To begin at the beginning—the day after my parting with you and Mitchell was rainy, and I spent it at home in a state of torpid and unprofitable dreaming. But next morning being dry, I resolved to commence my journey. Sandy accompanied me to Moffat; and during my ride my mind was occupied with all the cheering reflections which a passage through Tweedsmuir, the recommencement of Paedagogy, and the jolting of a strong cart-horse naturally inspired. About two o'clock I was on the summit of Ericstane. I looked down through the long deep vale of the Annan, remembered my friends upon the dim horizon, and half-uttering the wish that rose within me for their welfare, I turned me round and pursued the tenor of my way. In a short time I overtook two fellow travellers. One of them was a peasant of those parts: the other a stout square-made [man] of thirty in sailor's clothes, without shoes or shirt, with a countenance that seemed tanned by wind and weather, and expressive at once of energy and harmlessness. Upon investigation, I found that this unlucky person was one Thomas Cuvalló, a native of Constantinople, whose father had gone from the neighbourhood of Corinth—that he had served two years on board the Achilles English ship of war—was discharged in 1814—had afterwards been twice at India, whence he had returned last spring—and that travelling from one harbour to another in the vain hope of finding a vessel to carry him to his own country, he had expended all his money, and was now, as a last resort, making his way to Leith to try to procure either a passage to the Continent, or work to keep him from starving till times should mend. This Thomas Cuvallò, cast thus forlornly upon the wolds of Tweeddale, seemed to view his condition with an indifference that Zeno himself might have envied. The present of a piece of bread and cheese, which Mrs. Johnston had stowed into my pocket at Moffat, secured me his favour, and rendered him very communicative—though his stock of English vocables was far from extensive. After repeating me the Greek alphabet, he gave me the names of several objects in Romaic—most of which bore a striking resemblance to the Hellenic ; and when I inquired the signification of Zoë mou sas agapo, he replied with a grin of intelligence—"My life, I love thee." Then he proceeded to unfold to me the various grievances and molestations to which he (being a Djour) was exposed in Istambol—interspersing some account of his adventures in the Levant, together with notices of Mullahs, Jemams, and spinning Dervishes. Insensibly he digressed into the subject of magic and divination—and then set about revealing to me his ideas touching miracles and spectres. He said there were ten kinds of spectres. Under the head of miracles, he told me of certain pictures in St. Sophia's Church which no efforts of the Turks can efface, though they scrape and whitewash never so manfully. In the same church, it seems, there is a pulpit into which these unhappy Mussulmans can never gain admittance—axes and crows avail them nothing : but every Easter-eve there appears in it the figure of a man reading in a book, which when he shall have finished, the Mohammedan empire shall pass away for ever. He told me likewise of a well in Constantinople which contains a fish whose history is very remarkable. It happened to be frying in a pan in the palace at the time the Turks were about to enter the city ; when the incredulous and phlegmatic sovereign declared to the General who came to ask his advice, that he would as soon believe that this fish would jump from his frying-pan and live, as that the Turks were within many leagues of him. Whereupon the fish sprang out with great agility, and at this hour, he said, is living in its well—one side roasted and the other raw—and intends to do so till Greece shall be finally delivered from bondage. He never saw it, but his mother did. On our arrival at the Bield, I presented this unfortunate Argive with a draught of porter ; and leaving him—with a shilling, half a foot of tobacco, and my best wishes—to exert his begging powers in the neighbourhood, I advanced to Broughton in the midst of rain, and reached it at nightfall. In about half an hour there came a return chaise, into which I mounted : and after being dosed by the quaverings of a foolish Grocer who frequently attempted to sing, and sometimes amused by the proofs which our driver (a kind of Cuddie Headrigg fellow) produced of the insanity of Kennedy and his fair wife—both of renowned memory in your country, I came to Noblehouse at ten o'clock. Next day at noon I was in Edinburgh ; met with Irving at Leith in the evening, and finally without loss or detriment I reached my habitation in time for tea.

¹ One who does not fulfil his engagement.

² Hitchill, a substantial farmhouse, built by Carlyle's father, stands about midway between Ruthwell and Annan. Johnstone was tutor to Mr. Church's sons there.

Thus you see, after all the pains and pleasures, and triumphs and discomfitures, and perils by land and water, which a month spent in journeying upon the face of this fair earth has caused me to experience, I find myself once more seated in my little chamber, in this ancient burgh of Kirkcaldy—all my labours (like those of many wiser persons) having brought me only to the place from whence I started. Now that I have shaken hands with my honest neighbours, and resumed my occupations, I find that the remembrance of the wild and wondrous features of the Highlands assorts but awkwardly with the vulgar feelings to which the duties of a school give rise. Nevertheless I am peaceful and contented, and my days pass on pleasantly enough. What I deplore is that laziness and dissipation of mind to which I am still subject. At present I am quieting my conscience with the thought that I shall study very diligently this winter. Heaven grant it be so! for without increasing in knowledge what profits it to live? Yet the commencement has been inauspicious. Three weeks ago I began to read Wallace's Fluxions in the Encyclopædia, and had proceeded a little way, when the Quarterly Review, some problems in a very silly Literary and Statistical Magazine of which the Schoolmasters are supporters, Madam de Staël's Germany, etc. etc., have suspended my operations these ten days. After all I am afraid that this winter will pass as others have done before it—unmarked by improvement; and what is to hinder the next, and its followers till the end of the short season allotted me, to do so likewise? Pitiful destiny! my friend—yet how to be avoided? Lately I was renewing my old project of going to the French University. I have flattered myself with the thought that the collision with so many foreign minds, all toiling with might and main after the same object, would excite in me a permanent enthusiasm sufficient to carry me as far as my powers would go—straight forward—and not in the zig-zag directions—now flying, now creeping, which I at present pursue. Once I had almost determined next time I went to Edinburgh to inquire whether it would be possible to put this scheme in execution. But I suppose it will shortly dissipate—like other schemes of a similar nature, and leave me to form resolutions, and lament their failure as before. You will think me very weak and silly: I think so myself (hinc illae lacrymae), and know not whether I shall ever mend. I hope you order these matters better at Hitchill.

I told you I had seen the Quarterly Review. You would notice its contents in the newspaper. It is a long time since I ceased to be one of its admirers. The writers possess no inconsiderable share of dogmatism; and their learning, which they are, to an unpleasant degree, fond of displaying, is of that minute scholastic nature which is eminently distinguished from knowledge. Moreover their zeal for the "Social Order" seems to eat them up, and their horror of revolution is violent as a hydrophobia. These qualities are prominent in the last number—and accordingly it contains much disgusting matter; but I like it better (as a whole) than some of its predecessors. There is in it a distant and respectful but severe criticism on Dugald Stewart's writings, which comes much nearer my views of his character than any of the panegyrics which the Edinburgh Reviewers have so lavishly bestowed upon him. The other night I sat up till four o'clock reading Matthew Lewis' Monk. It is the most stupid and villainous novel that I have read for a great while. Considerable portions of it are grossly indecent, not to say brutish: one does not care a straw about one of the characters—and though "little Mat" has legions of ghosts and devils at his bidding, one views their movements with profound indifference. I have seen the first number of Constable's Magazine—it seems scarcely equal to Blackwood's—the is certainly a deplorable way of proceeding. If it be true in your case, as it is in mine, that the letters which pass between us occasion some of the happiest feelings that diversify this languid scene—it is pity that they are, on both sides, so sparingly supplied. I am no stranger to the dreary sense of vacuity that occupies the soul of him who sits down to fill a fair unblotted sheet of paper—when fit materials are wanting. But we are too fastidious in our choice of subjects ; and, above all, we ought to exert ourselves. It cannot be expected, that leading this unvaried life, which Providence has allotted us, we should have any wonderful tidings to communicate. We have nothing to say about the musical glasses, or bon-ton, nor can we pretend to speak of moving incidents by flood and field, of Cannibals that each other eat—the Anthropophagi—or aught of that nature. Yet are we not destitute of topics. The feelings and adventures of each of us (though of no moment to nearly all the world beside) may be interesting to the other, and by mutually communicating the progress of our studies, and the ideas (if any) that at times penetrate these benighted minds of ours—we may be encouraged to proceed on our way; rejoicing together, without flattery or jealousy or any such thing. I desire you to ponder upon this subject with due attention. Let us both write oftener—no matter how dull the letters be. When men cannot be social, they are content to be gregarious—and, though it be in a state of silence and torpor, experience some gratification from mere juxtaposition; so with regard to letters, it may safely be affirmed, that the shortest and meagrest is preferable to none at all. I am writing to you at present from a conviction of the truth and utility of this proposition. Since my departure from your country, nothing at all worth relating has happened to me. I have gone the round of my duties with all the regularity and sang-froid of a mill-horse. My mind has on the whole been placid—sometimes almost stagnant. And if it be true, as Flaccus hath it, that

“ Nil admirari prope res est una,
Solaque, quae possit facere et servare beatum,”

I am in a fair way of obtaining and preserving a considerable share of felicity. But I am much inclined to doubt Flaccus. The history of my studies exhibits the same stupid picture of impotent resolutions and unavailing regrets as heretofore. I may lay aside my French project when I please. What, as you say, should take me to Paris?¹ If they could pluck from my brain this rooted indolence, it might be worth thinking of. Soon after my arrival I fell to Wallace's *Fluxions*² with might and main. I would study, I thought, with great vehemence, every night—and the two hours at noon which I have to dispose of, I would devote to the reading of history and other lighter matters. But alas! two hours I found to be insufficient—by degrees poor Wallace was encroached upon—and is now all but finally discarded.

¹ "What wild-goose scheme is this of yours of going to France? Do you not know that the Polytechnic School is knocked on the head? The rest are not worth the naming. I say, 'Laddie Dinwoodie o' the Gardenholm, compose yourself to your potatoes there.'" From letter of Mitchell, 4th October 1817.

² Wallace was Professor of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh.

His introduction, it must be confessed, is ponderous and repulsive. His horror of the binomial theorem leads him into strange by-paths. But he demonstrates with great vigour. The worst of it is, we are led to his conclusion, as it were through a narrow lane—often, by its windings shutting from our view the object of our search, and never affording us a glimpse of the surrounding country. I wish I had it in my head. But, unless I quit my historical pursuits, it may be doubted whether this will ever happen. I have read through that clear and candid but cold-hearted narration of David Hume,—and now seven of Toby Smollett's eight chaotic volumes are before me. To say nothing of Gibbon (of whom I have only read a volume), nor of the Watsons, the Russells, the Voltaires, etc. etc., known to me only by name. Alas! thou seest how I am beset. It would be of little avail to criticise Bacon's Essays. It is enough to say, that Stewart's opinion of them is higher than I can attain. For style, they are rich and venerable—for thinking, incorrect and fanciful. Some time ago I bought me a copy of La Rochefoucault. It has been said that the basis of his system is the supposition of self-love being the motive of all our actions. It rather seems as if he had laid down no system at all. Regarding man as a wretched, mischievous thing, little better than a kind of vermin, he represents him as the sport of his passions, above all of vanity, and exposes the secret springs of his conduct always with some wit, and ('bating the usual sacrifices of accuracy to smartness), in general, with great truth and sagacity.

I perused your theorems with some attention. They are well worthy of a place in the Courier—though not for the purpose you mention. Mr. Johnston, if I mistake not, is a small gentleman, whom it would be no honour to demolish. I have scarcely done a problem since I saw you. There is one—"to find the locus of the vertex of a triangle, whose base is given, the one angle at the base being double of the other"—which I was trying some time ago. You will easily see that the locus is a hyperbola. The solution of problems, I begin to think, depends very much upon a certain sleight of hand, that can be acquired without great difficulty by frequent practice. I am not so sure as I used to be that it is the best way of employing oneself. Without doubt it concentrates our Mathematical ideas—and exercises the head; but little knowledge is gained by the process. If I am wrong—put me right when you send me a letter.

It is long since I was at Edinburgh, and when I was there nothing of importance was a doing. I heard Alison¹ preach. His elocution is clear—his style elegant—his ideas distinct rather than profound. Some person contrasting him and Chalmers, observed that the Prebendary of Sarum is like a glass of spruce beer—pure, refreshing, and unsubstantial—the minister of the Tron Kirk, like a draught of Johnnie Dowie's ale,—muddy, thick, and spirit-stirring.

¹ The Rev. Archibald Alison, “alors célèbre” as a preacher for the elegance of his style, and as a writer of an “Essay on Taste,” which was thought to “deserve a conspicuous place in every well-chosen library.” He was a marked figure in the society of Edinburgh.

Ivory¹ the celebrated analyst has quitted his situation at the College of (I forget its name). Wallace has succeeded him—and has left his own place to his brother. They were saying that Ivory had it in his mind to come to Edinburgh, and become a Teacher of Mathematics. Leslie has published an Arithmetic—similar I suppose to that treatise contained in the supplement of the Encyclopædia. He is to have a third class this winter. Playfair, I believe, is returned—and is to teach his class himself. Some time since, all the world was astonished at the 2nd number of Blackwood's (formerly the Edinburgh) Magazine. The greater part of it is full of gall: but the most venomous article is the “Translation of a Chaldee Manuscript,” said to be found in the Library of Paris. It is written in the phrase of the Scriptures, and [gives] an allegorical account of the origin and end of the late Edinburgh Magazine—greatly to the disparagement of Constable and the Editors. Most of the Authors of Edinburgh are characterised with great acrimony—under the likeness of birds and beasts and creeping things. Blackwood is like to be beleaguered with prosecutions for it—two are already raised against him. Replies in the shape of “explanations,” “letters to Drs. M’Crie and Thomson,” have been put forth—more are promised, and, doubtless, rejoinders are in a state of preparation. Whatever may become of Blackwood or his antagonists—the “reading” or rather the talking “public” is greatly beholden to the Author. He has kept its jaws moving these four weeks—and the sport is not finished yet.¹

¹ Professor Ivory, born 1765, later Sir James Ivory, gave up in 1819 the chair of Mathematics at the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, which he had held for fifteen years. He succeeded Leslie in the chair of Mathematics in Edinburgh.

As I have nothing more to say, I believe it will be as well to conclude here, by desiring thee to commend me to all my friends in thy neighbourhood—and to write immediately if thou hast any love for—Thine old and trusty friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

¹ This “Chaldee Manuscript” was mainly the work of Hogg, the “Ettrick Shepherd;” he was assisted by Wilson and Lockhart. It is reprinted in the collected edition of Pro-

XX.—To Mr. JAMES JOHNSTONE.

KIRKCALDY, 20th November 1817.

O thou Turk in grain!—Did not I send thee long ago a letter of three dense pages? Have not I any afternoon these three months turned my eye to the mantelpiece, upon my return from school, to see if peradventure the postman had brought me no word from Hitchill? And did he ever bring me any? Have not I—but what availeth it to talk? In sobriety I am dreadfully enraged. Write me a letter, I say, without further parley, or I will roar (as Bottom saith), so that it shall do any man's heart good to hear me. It is vain to tell me that you have no subject. Send me the meditations of your own heart—send me a register of your domestic occurrences—in short anything—an account of the prices of grain and black cattle rather than nothing at all.

fessor Wilson's works, with notes by his son-in-law, Professor Ferrier. The notoriety it had is due more to the character of the persons referred to in it, and the scandal occasioned by its ill-mannered satire, than to any genuine wit or humour.

My history since I wrote last to you contains no particular worth relating : I continue to follow my vocation with a peaceful and quiet heart, and might live under my vine and fig-tree, in case I had one, with none to make me afraid. I will not detain you long with my studies. I have been reading little except Coxe's travels in Switzerland, Poland, Russia, etc., Hume's history, together with part of Smollett, Gibbon, etc. Coxe is an intelligent man, and communicates in a very popular way considerable information concerning the countries through which he passed. Hume you know to be distinct and impartial : but he has less sympathy than might be expected with the heroic patriots—the Hampdens and the Sidneys, that glorify the pages of English history. I fear Smollett is going to be a confused creature. I have read but a volume of Gibbon—and I do not like him : his style is flowery ; his sarcasms wicked ; his notes oppressive, often beastly. They that cultivate literary small-talk have been greatly attracted for some time by the late number of Blackwood's (formerly the Edinburgh Magazine. It contains many slanderous insinuations against the publisher's rivals—particularly a paper entitled “Translation of a Chaldee Manuscript”—concerning the author and date of which it is gravely asserted the celebrated Sylvester de Sacy is writing a dissertation. The piece is divided into chapters and verses, and written in the Scripture language. It relates, in an emblematical manner, the rise, progress, decline and fall of the late Edinburgh Magazine. Constable and the Editor, as well as most of the Edinburgh Authors, are bitterly lampooned—under the similitudes of magicians, enchanters, spirits, birds, and four-footed beasts. The writer displays some talent—but his malice and profanity are as conspicuous as his wit. Three prosecutions have been raised against Blackwood on account of it—and the press is groaning with animadversions and replies. It is curious to observe the importance which the writings of Walter Scott have conferred on everything pertaining to the Border. These manufacturers deal largely in that article. Not a beldame, in the Merse,¹ can plant her cabbages—nor a tinker solder his kettle, but it must be forthwith communicated to the public in Blackwood's or the Scots Magazine. As if the Public had anything to do with the matter. I marvel that they have not some correspondent in the West Marches, to transmit them intelligence about the Spoon-men of Hightae, and the visions of Madam Peel. The dead-lights "gaun luntin by"² would be a rare morsel for them.

Little occurs in this neighbourhood to disturb our tranquillity—and still less that you would care for hearing. I attended the examination of Irving's Academy lately. He acquitted himself dexterously and seemed to give general satisfaction. His assistant is gone to Edinburgh—and he now manages the school himself—more comfortably, I hear, than formerly. A month ago that same Allen, whom

¹ The Merse or March, one of the divisions of Berwickshire extending from the Lammermoor Hills to the Tweed.

² Hightae was the headquarters of the tinkers and spoon-makers in Dumfriesshire. "Madam Peel" of Ecclefechan had a dream, in which she saw the death-lights going fuming by.

I once mentioned before, gave us a concluding lecture on the applications of Spurzheim's theory of Cranioscopy. It was greatly past comprehension. He seemed to have taken the fly-wheels from his brain, and said to it—brain, be at thy speed—produce me stuff—no matter of what colour, shape or texture :—and truly it was a frantic, incoherent story as heart could wish. It appears to have knocked the bottom out of Spurzheim's doctrine in these parts. Next came sundry players and other migratory animals of that sort. Last week we had a reciting man, Mr. Hamilton from Glasgow. Perhaps Miss Harper may have seen him. He understands his trade well ; but he is a drinking dog. The other day, there arrived from Edinburgh, a large shoal of preachers—Dixon, Nichol, Bullock, etc.—they preached all along this coast of ours. I heard Dixon—on Death ;—somewhat in King Cambyzes' vein. He is a witcracker by profession—otherwise a good fellow enough. Between ourselves, our own minister here is the veriest drug that ever hapless audience yawned under. He has ingine¹ too—but as much laziness along with it as might suffice for a Presbytery. I protest if he become no better, I shall be compelled to abandon him, in a great measure. Yesterday all the world was in mourning—and hearing sermons for the Princess Charlotte. I was much struck with the fate of that exalted person. Her age was within a month of my own. A few days ago she was

“As full of spirit as the month of May;
And gorgeous as the sun at Midsummer”—

and now! Truly pale Death overturns, with impartial foot, the hut of the poor man and the palace of the King.

It is past midnight—so I shall have done. Greet Mrs. Church and Miss Harper in my name. Mr. Church will prefer an account of the harvest to compliments. Therefore let him know that the state of Agricultural affairs in this district is very pitiful: the crops are backward to a degree that is quite unaccountable—and not paralleled by any season within the memory of man. Part of the oats is uncut ; and the whole country hereabout and westward, as I learn, is covered with shocks. The weather is moist too—so that altogether the Husbandman has an afflicting prospect. . . .

¹ Scotch for “genius” or “mind” in general.

To-morrow I go to Edinburgh with Irving. If we get safe over, you will find it noted in the vacant space. Meantime I'll to my truckle-bed. I have nothing more to tell you, but that I am as heretofore, yours truly,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXI.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

KIRKCALDY, 16th February 1818.

After an arduous struggle with sundry historians of great and small renown, I sit down to answer the much-valued epistle of my friend. Doubtless you are disposed to grumble that I have been so long in doing so ; but I have an argument in store for you. To state the proposition logically—this letter, I conceive, must either amuse you or not. If it amuse you—then certainly you cannot be so unreasonable as to cavil at a little harmless delay : and if it do not—you will rather rejoice that your punishment has not been sooner inflicted. Having thus briefly fixed you between the horns of my dilemma—from which, I flatter myself, no skill will suffice to extricate you—I proceed with a peaceful and fearless mind.

My way of life is still after the former fashion. I continue to teach (that I may subsist thereby), with about as much satisfaction as I should beat hemp, if such were my vocation. Excepting one or two individuals, I have little society that I value very highly, but books are a ready and effectual resource. May blessings be upon the head of Cadmus or the Phœnicians, or whoever invented books ! I may not detain you with the praises of an art that carries the voice of man to the extremities of the earth, and to the latest generations, but it is lawful for the solitary wight to express the love he feels for those companions so stedfast and unpresuming—that go or come without reluctance, and that, when his fellow animals are proud or stupid or peevish, are ever ready to cheer the languor of his soul, and gild the barrenness of life with the treasures of bygone times. Now and then I cross the Frith: but these expeditions are not attended with much enjoyment. The time has been when I would have stood a-tiptoe at the name of Edinburgh, but all that is altered now. The men with whom I meet are mostly preachers or students in divinity. These persons desire, not to understand Newton's philosophy, but to obtain a well 'plenished manse. Their ideas, which are uttered with much vain jangling, and generally couched in a recurring series of quips and most slender puns, are nearly confined to the church or rather kirk-session politics of the place, the secret habits, freaks, and adventures of the clergy or professors, the vacant parishes and their presentees, with patrons, tutors, and all other appurtenances of the tythepig-tail. Such talk is very edifying certainly: but I take little delight in it. My Theological propensities may be enclosed within very small compass—and with regard to witlings, jibbers or such small deer—the less one knows of them, it is not the worse. Yet there are some honest persons with whom I spend sometimes an afternoon comfortably enough. Before leaving this subject I wish to ask how your theological studies are advancing—and chiefly when you are to be at Kirkcaldy? I doubt my career “in the above line” has come to a close. Perhaps I have already told you that there are a thousand preachers on the field at present. Now from calculations founded on data furnished me by persons well versed in these matters—and managed by the rules laid down in Dilworth—I find that the last draught of these expectants, supposing no new ones to appear in the interim, will at their settlement be upon the verge of their grand climacteric. After which, the “prospects of being useful” cannot, one would think, be very bright.

I am sorry that Mathematics cause hepatitis in you. The pursuit of truth is certainly the most pleasing and harmless object that can engage the mind of man in this troublous world: and where shall we find her in her native purity, if not in the science of quantity and number? I counsel you to resume your operations as soon as your cranium will permit—which I trust will happen without loss of time. You will thank me, no doubt, for this sage advice; but if you knew the need I have of it myself, you would be the more disposed to admire my generosity. It is long since I told you I had begun Wallace, and that foreign studies had cast him into the shade. The same causes still obstruct my progress. You will perhaps be surprised that I am even now no farther advanced than “the circle of curvature.” I have found his demonstrations circuitous but generally rigorous. Yet I must except the proof of Maclaurin’s theorem in page 414—which, if I were not a little man and Wallace a great, I should have small hesitation to pronounce unsatisfactory, not to say absurd. I suppose I had read Hume’s England when I wrote last; and I need not repeat my opinion of it. My perusal of the continuation—eight volumes, of history, as it is called, by Tobias Smollett, M.D., and others, was a much harder and more unprofitable task. Next I read Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire—a work of immense research and splendid execution. Embracing almost all the civilised world, and extending from the time of Trajan to the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II. in 1453, it connects the events of ancient with those of modern history. Alternately delighted and offended by the gorgeous colouring with which his fancy invests the rude and scanty materials of his narrative; sometimes fatigued by the learning of his notes, occasionally amused by their liveliness, frequently disgusted by their obscenity, and admiring or deploring the bitterness of his skilful irony—I toiled through his massy tomes with exemplary patience. His style is exuberant, sonorous, and epigrammatic to a degree that is often displeasing. He yields to Hume in elegance and distinctness—to Robertson in talents for general disquisition—but he excels them both in a species of brief and shrewd remark for which he seems to have taken Tacitus as a model, more than any other that I know of.¹ The whole historical triumvirate are abundantly destitute of virtuous feeling—or indeed of any feeling at all. I wonder what benefit is derived from reading all this stuff. What business of mine is it though Timur Beg erected a pyramid of eighty thousand human skulls in the valley of Bagdad, and made an iron cage for Bajazet.

¹ “Irving’s library was of great use to me,” writes Carlyle,

“Gibbon, Hume, etc. etc. I think I must have read it almost through ;—inconceivable to me now with what ardour, with what greedy velocity, literally above ten times the speed I can now make with any book. Gibbon, in particular, I recollect to have read at the rate of a volume a day (twelve volumes in all) ; and I have still a fair recollection of it, though seldom looking into it since. It was of all the books, perhaps, the most impressive on me in my then stage of investigation and state of mind. I by no means completely admired Gibbon, perhaps not more than I now do, but his winged sarcasms, so quiet and yet so conclusively transpiercing and killing dead, were often admirable, potent, and illuminative to me. Nor did I fail to recognise his great power of investigating, ascertaining, of grouping and narrating ; though the latter had always, then as now, something of a Drury Lane character, the colours strong but coarse, and set off by lights from the side scenes. We had books from Edinburgh College Library, too. (I remember Bailly’s Histoire de l’Astronomie, ancient and also modern, which considerably disappointed me.) On Irving’s shelves were the small Didot French classics in quantity. With my appetite sharp, I must have read of French and English (for I don’t recollect much classicality, only something of mathematics in intermittent spasms) a great deal during those years.”—Reminiscences, i. 102.

And what have I to do with the savage cold-blooded policy of Charles, and the desolating progress of either Zinghis or Napoleon? It is in vain to tell us that our knowledge of human nature is increased by the operation. Useful knowledge of that sort is acquired not by reading but experience. And with regard to political advantages—the less one knows of them, the greater will be his delight in the principles of my Lords Castlereagh and Sidmouth, with their circulars, suspensions, holy leagues, and salvation of Europe. Yet if not profit there is some pleasure in history at all events. I believe we must not apply the cui bono too rigorously. It may be enough to sanction any pursuit, that it gratifies an innocent and still more an honourable propensity of the human mind. When I look back upon this paragraph, I cannot but admit that reviewing is a very beneficial art. If a dull man take it into his head to write either for the press or the post office, without materials—at a dead lift, it never fails to extricate him. But too much of one thing—as it is in the adage.

Therefore I reserve the account of Hume's Essays till another opportunity. At any rate the second volume is not finished yet—and I do not like what I have read of it anything [like] so well as I did the first. Neither would it be profitable to tell you the faults of Godwin's powerful but unnatural and bombastic novel¹—or to sing the praises of Rob Roy—which you have no doubt read and admired sufficiently already. Nor will I say one word about the swarms of magazines, pamphlets, and observations, which like the snow that falls in the river, are one moment white, then lost for ever. Here ends my chapter of reviewing.

Though possessing a sufficient confidence in the efficacy of my dilemma, I dare hardly venture to demand a speedy answer to this letter. But I do entreat you to overcome the vis inertiae which adheres to mind as well as matter—and send me some account of yourself with all the velocity imaginable. You will be through Russell before now. I long to hear your estimate of his merits¹ before I try him. I am thankful for your remarks upon Hunt and Hazlitt. Except through the medium of newspapers and reviews, I have no acquaintance with them. Hazlitt is somewhat celebrated for his essay on "Fine Arts" in the supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica; and for his critique on "Standard Novels" in the Edinburgh Review. I know not whether you have heard anything of Playfair's new demonstration (for such he protests it is) of the composition of forces—I have no room for it now. But if you like you shall have it next time—together with the wonderful slide upon mount Pilatus in the canton of Lucerne for conveying timber to the lake—which he examined whilst travelling in foreign parts—and described when I was in his class, with great complacency. Do you ever see that sluggish person Johnstone of Hitchill? I protest—but there is not 'space for protesting. Tell him simply to write instanter if he wish his head to continue above his hass-bone.¹—I remain, my dear Mitchell, yours faithfully,

¹ Godwin's now hardly remembered novel, Mandeville, was published in 1817.

¹ Russell's History of Modern Europe.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

(Send a letter quickly, an thou love me.)

XXII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

KIRKCALDY, 25th May 1818.

MY DEAR FRIEND—After parting with you on the quay of Burntisland, I proceeded slowly to the eastward; and seating myself upon the brow of that crag from which the poor King Alexander brak's neck-bane,² I watched your fleet-sailing skiff till it vanished in the mists of the Forth. So Mitchell is gone! thought I, we shall have no more chat together for many

¹ Neck.

² "As he [Alexander III.] was riding in the dusk of the evening along the sea-coast of Fife, betwixt Burntisland and Kinghorn, he approached too near the brink of the precipice, and his horse starting or stumbling, he was thrown over the rock and killed on the spot. It is now no less than five hundred and forty-two years since Alexander's death [in 1285], yet the people of the country still point out the very spot where it happened, and which is called the King's Crag."—Tales of a Grandfather, ch. vi.

a day ; but he will write me a letter in a week at any rate : and with that consolatory expectation, I pensively returned to Kirkcaldy. If excessive studiousness has frustrated this hope, then it is well, and I shall wait contentedly till some hour of relaxation occur, when you may sport upon paper for my benefit—without detriment to your graver pursuits. But if sheer indolence possesses you, it were proper to cast off the noxious spell, as soon as possible. From the fact of my writing at present, you may conjecture (and rightly) that my own avocations are slackly pursued. My conduct, I fear, is absurd. I believe it to be a truth (and though no creature believed it, it would continue to be a truth) that a man's dignity in the great system of which he forms a part is exactly proportional to his moral and intellectual acquirements : and I find moreover, that when I am assaulted by those feelings of discontent and ferocity which solitude at all times tends to produce, and by that host of miserable little passions which are ever and anon attempting to disturb one's re-to continue above his hass-bone.¹—I remain, my dear Mitchell, yours faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

(Send a letter quickly, an thou love me.)

XXII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

KIRKCALDY, 25th May 1818.

MY DEAR FRIEND—After parting with you on the quay of Burntisland, I proceeded slowly to the eastward; and seating myself upon the brow of that crag from which the poor King Alexander brak's neck-bane,² I watched your fleet-sailing skiff till it vanished in the mists of the Forth. So Mitchell is gone! thought I, we shall have no more chat together for many

¹ Neck.

² "As he [Alexander III.] was riding in the dusk of the evening along the sea-coast of Fife, betwixt Burntisland and Kinghorn, he approached too near the brink of the precipice, and his horse starting or stumbling, he was thrown over the rock and killed on the spot. It is now no less than five hundred and forty-two years since Alexander's death [in 1285], yet the people of the country still point out the very spot where it happened, and which is called the King's Crag."—Tales of a Grandfather, ch. vi.

a day ; but he will write me a letter in a week at any rate : and with that consolatory expectation, I pensively returned to Kirkcaldy. If excessive studiousness has frustrated this hope, then it is well, and I shall wait contentedly till some hour of relaxation occur, when you may sport upon paper for my benefit—without detriment to your graver pursuits. But if sheer indolence possesses you, it were proper to cast off the noxious spell, as soon as possible. From the fact of my writing at present, you may conjecture (and rightly) that my own avocations are slackly pursued. My conduct, I fear, is absurd. I believe it to be a truth (and though no creature believed it, it would continue to be a truth) that a man's dignity in the great system of which he forms a part is exactly proportional to his moral and intellectual acquirements : and I find moreover, that when I am assaulted by those feelings of discontent and ferocity which solitude at all times tends to produce, and by that host of miserable little passions which are ever and anon attempting to disturb one's repose, there is no method of defeating them so effectual as to take them in flank by a zealous course of study. I believe all this—but my practice clashes with my creed. I had read some little of Laplace when I saw you; and I continue to advance with a diminishing velocity. I turned aside into Leslie's Conics—and went through it, in search of two propositions, which, when in your geometrical vein, you will find little difficulty in demonstrating. Take them if you will. [Propositions omitted.] . . .

I likewise also turned aside into Charles Bossut's Mécanique—to study his demonstration of pendulums, and his doctrine of forces. The text is often tediously explanatory—and in the notes it is but a dim hallucination of the truth that I can obtain through the medium of integrals and differentials by which he communicates it. However, I am now pretty well convinced that a body projected from the earth with a velocity of 39,000 feet per second will never return. I got Lagrange's Mécanique Analytique also, but to me it is nearly a sealed book. After all these divarications, and more which I shall mention afterwards, you must pardon me if I am not above half through the Exposition du système du monde. The first volume is beautiful, and can be understood; great part of the second is demonstrated, he says, in the Mécanique celeste, and I am obliged to be content with ignorantly admiring these sublime mysteries which I am assured are de hautes connaissances, les delices des êtres pensans. Surely it is a powerful instrument which enables the mind of a man to grasp the universe and to elicit from it and demonstrate such laws—as that, whatever be the actions of the planets on each other, the mean distances of each from the sun and its mean motion can never change: and that, every variation in any of their elements must be periodical. To see these truths, my good Robert—to feel them as one does the proportions of the sphere and cylinder! 'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished—but not very likely ever to arrive. Sometimes, indeed, on a fine evening, and when I have quenched my thirst with large potations of Souchong, I say to myself—away with despondency—hast thou not a soul and a kind of understanding in it? And what more has any analyst of them all? But next morning, alas, when I consider my understanding—how coarse yet feeble it is, and how much of it must be devoted to supply the vulgar wants of life, or to master the paltry but never-ending vexations with which all creatures are beleaguered—I ask how is it possible not to despond? Especially, when, as old Chaucer said of the Astrolaby,¹ “the conclusions that have been founden or ells possiblye might be founde in so noble an instrument, ben unknownen perfytely to any mortal man in this region, as I suppose.” But I fear you are tired of these prosings—you must bear with them. Excepting the few friends whom Providence has given me, and whose kindness I wish never to forfeit, I have and am likely to have little else but these pursuits to derive enjoyment from; and there is none but you to talk it over with. They are all preaching here, and care not a straw for Laplace and his calculus both. You will be preaching one of these days too—and perhaps—but it is needless to anticipate—you must not leave off Mathematics.

¹ Vide his treatise of the Astrolaby, “compowned for oure orizont after the latitude of Oxenforde,” to instruct “lytel Lowis my sonne.”—T. C.

Moore's Lalla Rookh and Byron's Childe Harold (canto fourth) formed an odd mixture with these speculations. It was foolish, you may think, to exchange the truths of philosophy for the airy nothings of these sweet singers: but I could not help it. Do not fear that I will spend time in criticising the tulip cheek. Moore is but a sort of refined Mahometan, and (with immense deference) I think that his character in a late *Edinburgh Review*¹ is somewhat too high. His imagination seldom quits material, even sexual objects—he describes them admirably,—and intermingles here and there some beautiful traits of natural pathos; but he seems to have failed (excepting partially in the Fire-Worshippers) in his attempts to portray the fierce or lofty features of human character. Mokannah in particular, insensible to pain or pity or any earthly feeling, might as well, at least for all practical purposes, have been made of clockwork as of flesh and blood. I grieve to say that the catastrophe excited laughter rather than horror. The poisoned believers sitting round the table, with their black swollen jobber-nowls reclining on their breasts, and saucer-eyes fixed upon the ill-favoured prophet—appeared so like the concluding scene of an election-dinner, when all are dead-drunk but the Provost, a man of five bottles, with a carbuncled face, and an amorphous nose, that I was forced to exclaim, Du sublime au ridicule il n'y a qu'un pas. Moore is universally said to be the author of Letters from the Fudge Family—a work, if I may judge by copious extracts, of extraordinary humour. Phil Fudge seems to mean poor Southey. I perceive, Mitchell, that I cannot finish this letter in time for the post as I intended, and since there is still a streak of radiance on the horizon's brim, I may as well go forth to enjoy it. Therefore good-bye, my old friend, for a short season. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ o'clock P.M.—11 o'clock—I return from a saunter with Pears, and an unprofitable inspection of his chaotic library, to conclude my task. Pennam amens capio; nec sat rationis in penna. Be easy in your mind; I am going to write, not fly. That dissertation upon the Eastern Romance is so long-winded that I cannot in conscience afflict you with any remarks upon the deep-toned but [word illegible] poetry of Lord Byron. What think you of his address to Alphonso duke of Ferrara, the persecutor of Tasso?

¹ In an article on Lalla Rookh, by Jeffrey, November 1817.

“Thou! formed to eat, and be despised and die,
Even as the beasts that perish, save that thou Hadst a more splendid trough and wider sty:
He! etc.”

This is emphatic enough. I need not speak of Dr. Chalmers' boisterous treatise upon the causes and cure of pauperism in the last Edinburgh Review. His reasoning (so they call it) is disjointed or absurd—and his language a barbarous jargon—agreeable neither to Gods nor men. And what avail the Church politics of the General Assembly—the performances of the fire-proof signora (Geraldini?)—or the flagellations of Bill Blackwood, and the as paltry antagonist of Bill Blackwood? But let me repress these effusions of vanity;—pleasant they may be to myself—yet unbecoming—till I turn a renowned man—which unless things be miserably conducted—will certainly (one would think) come to pass one way or another. What is the matter with Johnstone? He is becoming very unguidable—and declines apparently either to hop or win—in the way of writing letters. If you will not write to me yourself, Mr. Robert, I cannot help it, but must continue though “without the least preface,” to subscribe myself your faithful but disconsolate friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXIII.—To Mr. JAMES JOHNSTONE.

KIRKCALDY, 26th June 1818.

DEAR JOHNSTONE—It is about three weeks since, after entering my chamber on a Sunday evening, wearied with the toil, and sick with the inanity of an excursion to Edinburgh, my eyes were rejoiced with a sight of your letter. I must not exchange the sentiments with which you commence ; the partiality of friendship, and the modesty of him who feels it, may become excessive without ceasing to be amiable. I have little genius for the complimentary, and, therefore, shall not say in what esteem I hold your communications,—let it be sufficient to observe that the emotions they awaken are among the happiest of my life, and that you write so seldom is the very subject of complaint.

My journey to Edinburgh, you have learned, was productive of little enjoyment. How should it indeed ? Most of my acquaintances are looking out for kirks ; some by diligent pedagogy, accompanied by a firm belief in the excellence of certain country gentlemen, and others by assiduously dancing attendance upon the leading clergymen of our venerable Establishment. This is as it should be ; but I have no part or lot in the matter. The rest speak of the St. Ann-street-buildings, the Brownie of Bodsbeck, with other tales by James Hogg, and things of that stamp. Now, the St. Ann-street-buildings concern only some feuars of the extended royalty; and as for the Brownie of Bodsbeck, with other tales by James Hogg, they seem to have been written under the influence of a liquor more potent than that of the Pierian spring. So there needs not be much said about them. If I go to the bookseller's shop I find polemical Sciolists and pathetic beaux-esprits. And when I walk along the streets I see fair women, whom it were a folly to think of for a moment, and fops (dandies as they are called in current slang), shaped like an hour-glass—creatures whose life and death, as Crispin pithily observes, "I esteem of like importance, and decline to speak of either." It would be ridiculous to fret at this. Being a person of habits—I fear somewhat anomalous—belonging to no profession, and waiting, therefore, on no idol of the tribe, or rather fashionable one, to bow down before, it is but little sympathy I can look for.

I am far from laughing at your agricultural studies, nor is it wonderful that you dislike teaching—a lover of it is rare. No trade—but why do I talk? Discontent is the most vulgar of all feelings. It is utterly useless, moreover, more than useless. Let us cultivate our minds, and await the issue calmly, whatever it may be. The honest Hibernian had nothing to support himself, his wife, and children, nothing but these four bones. Yet he did not mourn nor despair.

Your project of a tour to the Cumberland Lakes meets my mind exactly. Get matters arranged, and I shall gladly accompany you to Keswick or Ulleswater, or wheresoever you please. . . . You must endeavour to have the route marked out before this night five weeks. On Saturday, the 1st of August, if all goes well, I hope to see you at Mainhill. You must be there any way if it be in your power.

The last book worth mentioning which I have perused was Stewart's Preliminary Dissertation, for the second time. The longer I study the works of this philosopher, the more I become convinced of two things—first, that in perspicacity and comprehension of understanding he yields to several; but, secondly, that in taste, variety of acquirements, and what is of more importance, in moral dignity of mind, he has no rival that I know of. Every liberal opinion has at all times found in him a zealous advocate. When he has come before the public he has borne himself with a carriage so meek, yet so commanding, and now, when, with unabating ardour, he is retired to devote the last remnant of his well-spent life to the great cause of human improvement, his attitude is so pensively sublime, I regard him with a reverence which I scarcely feel for any other living person. He is a man, take him for all in all, we shall not look upon his like again. There is something melancholy in the thought that the world cannot long enjoy the light of such a mind. But the cup goes round, and who so artful as to put it by. Poor Donaldson, you see, is cut off in the prime of his days. Poor fellow, few summers have passed since he was my companion, as careless, good-natured a being as ever breathed the air of this world. And to think that he is gone excites many painful reflections upon the obvious but solemn truth that the place which now knows us will ere long know us no more at all, for ever. It is foolish, we are told, to shrink from, or repine at the unalterable fate to which this earth and those that it inherit have been doomed. It is unspeakably ungrateful, too, for who would wish to live thus for ever? And one year or a thousand centuries are the same fleeting instant in the everlasting sweep of ages that have been and are to come.

“Ex Asia rediens (says Servius Sulpicius in his far-famed letter to Tully) cum ab Aegina Megaram versus navigarem, cœpi regiones circumcirca prospicere. Post nos erat Aegina, ante Megara, dextrâ Piræeus, sinistrâ Corinthus; quæ oppida quodam tempore florentissima fuerunt, nunc prostrata ac diruta ante oculos jacent. Cœpi egomet mecum sic cogitare: Hem! nos homunculi indignamur, si quis nostrum interiit aut occisus est quorum vita brevior esse debet, cum uno loco tot oppidorum cadavera projecta jacent! Visne tu te, Servi, cohibere, et meminisse, hominem te esse natum?”

All this may be true philosophy, yet still some internal tears will fall on the graves of those whom we have loved, and who are departed to that land of darkness, and of the shadow of death, about which so much is hoped or feared and so little understood. Those are mournful thoughts. They come across my mind at times in the stillness of the solitary night, and plunge me into an ocean of fearful conjectures. "My God," exclaims the melancholy and high-minded Pascal, "enlighten my soul or take from it this reasoning curiosity." Montaigne tells us that he "reposed upon the pillow of doubt." And there is a day coming—it is even now not far distant—when all mine shall be explained or need no explanation. I will pursue these reflections no further. One thing, let us never cease to believe whatever be our destiny—an upright mind is the greatest blessing we can obtain or imagine.—Believe me to be, yours faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXIV.—To Mr. THOMAS MURRAY, Manse of Sorbie, by Wigtown, Galloway.

KIRKCALDY, 28th July 1818.

MY DEAR SIR — Whilst arranging some scattered papers previously to my departure from this place, which I am to leave to-morrow for Dumfriesshire, I happened to alight upon your letter. The recollection that it was unanswered awakened a feeling of remorse in my mind; and though it is near midnight, I have determined to employ the passing hour by writing you a few lines by way of a return for your affectionate farewell. If I have not done so sooner, impute it, I beseech you, to want of ability rather than of inclination. Be assured, I have not forgotten the many joyful days which long ago we spent together—sweet days of ignorance and airy hope! They had their troubles too: but to bear them, there was a light-heartedness and buoyancy of soul, which the sterner qualities of manhood, and the harsher buffetings that require them, have for ever forbidden to return.

I forbear to say much of the pursuits which have engaged me. They would little interest you, I fear. With most young men, I have had dreams of intellectual greatness, and of making me a name upon the earth. They were little else but dreams. To gain renown is what I do not hope, and hardly care for, in the present state of my feelings. The improvement of one's mind, indeed, is the noblest object which can occupy any reasonable creature: but the attainment of it requires a concurrence of circumstances over which one has little control. I now perceive more clearly than ever, that any man's opinions depend not on himself so much as on the age he lives in, or even the persons with whom he associates. If his mind at all surpass their habits, his aspirations are quickly quenched in the narcotic atmosphere that surrounds him. He forfeits sympathy, and procures hatred if he excel but a little the dull standard of his neighbours. Difficulties multiply as he proceeds; and none but chosen souls can rise to any height above the level of the swinish herd. Upon this principle, I could tell you why Socrates sacrificed at his death to Esculapius—why Kepler wrote his Cosmographic Harmony, and why Sir Thomas More believed the Pope to be infallible. Nevertheless one should do what he can.

I need not trouble you with the particulars of my situation. My prospects are not extremely brilliant at present. I have quitted all thoughts of the church, for many reasons, which it would be tedious, perhaps displeasing, to enumerate. I feel no love (I should wish to see the human creature that feels any love) for the paltry trade I follow; and there is before me a chequered and fluctuating scene, where I see nothing clearly, but that a little time will finish it. Yet wherefore should we murmur? A share of evil greater or less (the difference of shares is not worth mentioning) is the unalterable doom of mortals: and the mind may be taught to abide it in peace. Complaint is generally despicable, always worse than unavailing. It is an instructive thing, I think, to observe Lord Byron surrounded with the voluptuousness of an Italian Seraglio, chaunting a mournful strain over the wretchedness of human life; and then to contemplate the poor but lofty-minded Epictetus—the slave—of a cruel master too—and to hear him lifting up his voice to far distant generations, in these unforgotten words: Ἀπαιδέντου ἔργον, τὸ ἄλλοις ἐγκαλεῖν, ἐφ' οἷς αὐτὸς πράσσει κακῶς · ἡργμένου παιδεύεσθαι, τὸ ἐαυτῷ · πεπαιδευμένον, τὸ μήτ' ἄλλω, μήθ' ἐαυτῷ.¹ But truce to moralising—suffice it, with our Stoic to say, ἀνέχου καὶ ἀπέχου, which, being interpreted, is suffer and abstain.

I heard with pleasure that you had got licence, and had preached with success. May you soon obtain a settlement, and feel happy in it. A Scottish clergyman, when he does his duty faithfully, is both a useful and honourable member of society. When he neglects his office, and has subscribed his creed “with a sigh or a smile” (as Gibbon spitefully remarks)—the less one says of him the better. But I hope other things of you.

Three weeks ago I had a visit from the forlorn Poet Stewart Lewis. He came into the school one morning, and stood plumb up without speaking a word. I was touched to see the gray veteran, in tattered clothes, and with a pensive air, waging against necessity the same unprosperous battle which, any time these forty years, has been his constant occupation. His wife died many months ago; and since that event he has been protracting a miserable, useless existence (he called it) by selling small poems of his own composing. I understand he got rid of some part of his cargo here;—and of all his sorrows, by a copious potation of usquebaugh. He spoke to me with much gratitude of a certain young lady in Wigton, who for your sake (I think of that Master Brook) had sought out his lodgings and replenished his purse. He has many faults, and the crowning one of drunkenness—but some genius likewise, and a degree of taste, which, considering his habits and situation, is altogether surprising. Moreover he is old, and poor, and not unthankful for any kindness shown him. I pity the man and would not wish to see him die a mendicant.¹

¹ “It is the way of an uninstructed man to blame others for what falls out ill for him ; of one beginning to be instructed to blame himself, but of one well-instructed to blame neither another nor himself.”—Encheiridion, c. v.

¹ Mitchell writing to Carlyle, on the 12th of October, says, "You would probably see by the Newspapers the death of poor Stewart Lewis. He had been somewhere about Maxwelltown tasting a little of his dear usquebaugh. He fancied his face dirty (I have this account from his son), and, with laudable desire to get it cleaned, went to the Nithside, where, stooping too low, he toppled headlong, and with difficulty re-

Perhaps you are acquainted with the tragic end of poor William Irving whom you once knew. Though auguring little good of him, I never feared that he would do that deed, which renders his name a thing which sober people may not mention. But now that it has happened, suicide seems a not unsuitable conclusion to his frantic and miserable way of life. I bewail his mournful destiny. Had the talents which he certainly did possess been cultivated with judgment, and directed by principle of any kind—he might have been a credit to his country.

If you write to me before September, let your letter be directed to Mainhill near Ecclefechan—after that period, to Mrs. Skeens, Kirkwynd, Kirkcaldy. Are you to leave Sorbie?

gained the side. Though his clothes were hung before a fire during the night, they were still wet next day; an inflammatory fever ensued, and Lewis ended his changeful life in a low lodging-house in the village of Ruthwell. The least thing that I could do was to attend the funeral of him who had dedicated his poems to the Students of his native Annandale. He was decently interred in this churchyard, where a stone with a suitable inscription, as is customary in cases of this kind, is about to be erected to his memory."

I must hear of your destination. During the vacation I intend to visit the Cumberland Lakes; and I should like to see Galloway also, but I cannot make it out this Summer. Will you be in Edinburgh any time soon? When or where shall I see you? Write me a letter at least when you can find leisure, and believe me to be, my dear Murray, yours faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXV.—To his FATHER.

KIRKCALDY, 2d September 1818.

MY DEAR FATHER—Having arrived in safety at this place, I sit down to give you an account of my adventures by the way—and my proceedings since I left the Mainhill. After shaking hands with Sandy I winded down the Baileyhill, easily forded the Black Esk, and proceeded along the banks of its sister stream to Eskdalemoor-manse, which I reached about seven o'clock. I cast many an anxious thought after Sandy and the horses which he was conducting: but I hope they arrived in safety after all. The minister is a kind, hospitable man. Saturday morning was wet, and he would fain have persuaded me to stay all day with him, but when he could not succeed he spread before me a large map of Dumfriesshire, pointed out the best road, and gave me a line to one Anderson (a cousin of his wife), from whom I was to get some meat as I passed Lyart upon Meggat water. After my departure the rain slackened a little, but the hilltops were covered with a dark mist which the wind tossed about briskly. I proceeded up the Esk, which originates about six miles above the manse in the junction of two streams, the Tomleuchar and the Glenderg—of which the latter rises near the eastern edge of Ettrick Pen, the former a few miles eastward. Ascending Glenderg I came into Ettrick water, which I crossed at a place called Cosser's hill, where a hospitable but sluttish and inquisitive old woman gave me some potatoes, etc., with directions for finding Kiskenhope—the head of the two Lochs (St. Mary's and the Lowes) upon Yarrow water, distant about four miles. I was upon the brow of a solitary ridge of moorland hills when I saw the two clear blue lakes, and in about half an hour I had crossed the stream which unites them, and was upon the road up Meggat, a brook which rises a little to the north of Whitecomb, and joins the easternmost lake (St. Mary's) after a course of about six miles. When I got to Anderson's at Lyart it was almost seven o'clock, and his sister pressed me much to stay all night, the man (an arrant miser as I found afterwards) did not press me so keenly. As it was raining a little, and Peebles fourteen miles distant, I thought of accepting their invitation, and having got some tea was endeavouring to enter into some conversation with this rich old farmer. But when he perceived that I was going to continue with him all night he became so churlish in his replies that I could think of it no longer, and taking my hat and stick I thanked him for his entertainment, and crossed the water of Meggat, leaving this Nabal of Yarrow with his sister in utter amazement at my departure, for it was now near eight, and the night was rainy. But in half an hour I came into road which I had travelled over before (as I came down), and though the rain continued, I reached the house of a kind herdsman upon Manor water (which comes into the Tweed near Peebles), and met with a warm reception from him, after nine o'clock. Next morning was dry, and the day became windy : so I arrived at Edinburgh that same afternoon about five—and staid all night with Donaldson—formerly Irving's assistant at Kirkcaldy. Next day I saw Mr. Leslie, who was very kind, and got me a book that I was wanting from the library, and talked with me about two hours very frankly. I also purchased for my kind Mother a black bonnet with ribands and other equipments, which the people engaged to put into a box and send by Gavin Johnston the Annan carrier. I hope she will accept of it for my sake, who owe her so much. It is directed to the care of Robert Brand, Lockerbie. I enclose you a draught for £15, which you will know how to dispose of. It is not likely that I shall feel any want of it at present, and no one can have a better right to it than you.

My prospects in this place are far from brilliant at present. About a month before I went away, a body had established himself in my neighbourhood, and taken up a school, but could make next to nothing of it. During the vacation, however, he seems to have succeeded in getting most of my scholars—and to-day I mustered only twelve. This will never do. The people's rage for novelty is the cause of it, I suppose, for the poor creature is very ignorant, and very much given to drink. I make no doubt I could re-establish the school, but the fact is I am very much tired of the trade, and very anxious to find some other way of making my bread, and this is as good a time for trying it as any other. Irving is going away too, and I shall have no associate in the place at all. I think I could find private teaching perhaps about Edinburgh to support me till I could fall into some other way of doing. • At any rate, I have more than seventy pounds (besides what I send you) of ready money, and that might keep me for a season. In short, I only wait for your advice, till I give in my resignation against the beginning of December. I have thought of trying the law, and several other things, but I have not yet got correct information about any of them. Give my kindest love to all my brothers and sisters. I expect a letter very soon, for I shall be unhappy till I resolve upon something. In the meantime, however, I remain, my dear Father, yours affectionately,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

I have not yet seen much of the country, but the crops seem more backward than in Dumfriesshire. They are busy exporting potatoes from this place to England—what part I know not—so the article will probably be dear.

XXVI.—From his MOTHER.

MAINHILL, 31st October 1818.

DEAR TOM—You will by this time be thinking that I have forgot you quite, but far from that you are little out of my mind. I have sent your socks ; they are not so fine as I could have wished, not having as much [wool] as could be done on the mill, but I hope they will do for the winter. I received the bonnet ; it is a very good one. I doubt it would be very high. I can only thank you at this time. I have been rather uneasy about your settlement, but seek direction alway from Him who can give it aright, and may He be thy guide, Tom. I have been very uneasy about your things being so long in going off, but one disappointment after another it is so. Tell me if anything else is wanting that is in my power and I will get it you. I have reason to be thankful I am still in good health and spirits, yet I would be gratified much to hear of you comfortably settled nevertheless. Let us learn to submit, and take it as God is pleased to send it. It is a world of trouble at the best. Write me soon, Tom, do, and tell me all your news, good and bad. We have got all our crop in ; it looks very well. I daresay you will have heard of Mrs. Calvert's death. She died soon after you went away, rather hastily. But I daresay I have as much written as you will be able to read well. Send me a long letter. Tell me honestly if thou reads a Chapter every day, and may the Lord bless and keep thee. I add no more, but remain your loving mother and sincere friend,

MARGARET CARLYLE.

XXVII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

KIRKCALDY, 6th November 1818.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—About a week ago I received a letter from the Magistrates of this burgh (which letter I even now use as a blot sheet) accepting my “resignation of the Teacher of the Grammar school,” as their phrase goes : and in a fortnight, I shall quit my present situation. Although I relate this event so abruptly, my part in it has not been performed without profound deliberation. You shall hear it all. The miseries of school teaching were known long before the second Dionysius, who opened shop, in the city of Corinth, about the middle of the fourth century before Christ. Lucian (the Voltaire of antiquity) has left his opinion, in writing, that when the Gods have determined to render a man ridiculously miserable, they make a schoolmaster of him ; and an experience of more than four years does not, in my own case, authorise me to contradict this assertion. But of late, the loss of my companions (Irving, who left us last Saturday, and Pears, who will depart in ten days), together with some convincing proofs of unpopularity, have given to my reflections on this subject a complexion more serious than ordinary.¹ I have thought

¹ "In the space of two years," writes Carlyle in his Reminiscences (i. 140), "or rather more, we had all got tired of schoolmastering and its mean contradictions and poor results : Irving and I quite resolute to give it up for good ; the headlong Piers [sic] disinclined for it on the then terms longer, and in the end of 1819 (or '18? at this hour I know not which, and the old Letters which would show are too deep hidden), we all three went away ; Irving and I to Edinburgh, Piers to his own 'East Country'—whom I never saw again with eyes, poor good rattling soul. Irving's outlooks in Edinburgh were not of the best, considerably checkered with dubiety, opposition, or even flat disfavour in some quarters ; but at least they were far superior to mine, and indeed, I was beginning my four or five most miserable, dark, sick, and heavy-laden years ; Irving, after some staggerings aback, his seven or eight healthiest and brightest. He had, I should guess, as one item several good hundreds of money to wait upon. My peculium I don't recollect, but it could not have exceeded £100. I was without friends, experience, or connection in the sphere of human business, was of shy humour, proud enough and to spare, and had begun my long curriculum of dyspepsia, which has never ended since !"

much and long of the irksome drudgery—the solitude—the gloom of my condition. I reasoned thus : These things may be endured, if not with a peaceful heart, at least with a serene countenance ; but it is worth while to inquire whether the profit will repay the pain of enduring them. A scanty and precarious livelihood constitutes the profit ; you know me, and can form some judgment of the pain. But there is loss as well as pain. I speak not of the loss of health : but the destruction of benevolent feeling, that searing of the heart, which misery, especially of a petty kind, sooner or later, will never fail to effect—is a more frightful thing. The desire, which, in common with all men, I feel for conversation and social intercourse, is, I find, enveloped in a dense repulsive atmosphere—not of vulgar mauvaise honte, though such it is generally esteemed—but of deeper feelings, which I partly inherit from nature, and which are mostly due to the undefined station I have hitherto occupied in society. If I continue a schoolmaster, I fear there is little reason to doubt that these feelings will increase, and at last drive me entirely from the kindly sympathies of life, to brood in silence over the bitterness into which my friendly propensities must be changed. Where then would be my comfort? Had I lived at Athens, in the plastic days of that brilliant commonwealth, I might have purchased "a narrow paltry tub," and pleased myself with uttering gall among them of Cynosarges.¹ But in these times—when political institutions and increased civilisation have fixed the texture of society—when Religion has the privilege of prescribing principles of conduct, from which it is a crime to dissent—when, therefore, the aberrations of philosophical enthusiasm are regarded not with admiration but contempt—when Plato would be dissected in the Edinburgh Review, and Diogenes laid hold of by "a Society for the Suppression of Beggars"—in these times—it may not be. But this cure, or any other that I know of, not being applicable, it were better to avoid the disease. Therefore I must cease to be a pedagogue. The question is now reduced within a narrower compass. It remains only to inquire at what time I can quit this employment, with the greatest chance of finding another. But how, except by some brisk sally, am I likely ever to emerge from my thralldom? Scantily supplied with books, without a rival or a comrade in the pursuit of anything scientific, little can be achieved in that direction. With none here even to show me the various ways of living in the world, much less to help me into any of them—reduced to contemplate the busy scene of life, through the narrow aperture of printed books, Damoetas being judge, I have a right metaphorically speaking, to be his great Apollo; inasmuch as I have found and occupied that station where the space of heaven extends not more than three ells.¹ The brightest of my days too are flying fast over my head; and the sooner I resolve, the better. Besides at this time (that of Irving's departure) I give my employers the fittest opportunity to erect an institution for education, that may end their woes on that head—which, for the last six years, have been neither few nor small. In short the present is the time. And I wrote my demission on the 23d October accordingly. After receiving the answer above alluded to, the business seemed to be done; when on Monday last, a certain very kind and worthy banker, Mr. Swan, attended by another person, came to ask me, whether if they could offer me a salary between £120 and £150, for teaching, in a private capacity, some thirty scholars, I would not be induced to remain another year among them. Upon my signifying an assent, they left me: to procure subscribers, I suppose; and I have heard no more of their proceedings. But for this proposal, the probable success of which I cannot estimate, and do not rate highly—Edinburgh is certainly my destination for the winter.

¹ The gymnasium outside Athens where Antisthenes taught, whence the Cynics, some say, derived their name.

¹ "Dic, quibus in terris,—et eris mihi magnus Apollo—
Tris pateat coeli spatium non amplius ulnas."

Virgil, Ecloga iii. 104, 105.

I have calculated that, with economy, I can live there for two years; independently of private teaching, which however I should not refuse, if, as is not likely, it should offer itself. During that period, if I do not study, I deserve to continue ignorant. Mineralogy is to be my winter's work. I have thought of writing for booksellers. Risum teneas; for at times I am serious in this matter. In fine weather it does strike me that there are in this head some ideas, a few disjecta membra, which might find admittance into some one of the many publications of the day. To live by Authorship was never my intention. It is said not to be common at present; and happily so: for if we may credit biographers, the least miserable day of an author's life is generally the last.

“ . . . Sad cure! for who would lose,
Though full of pain, this intellectual being,
Those thoughts that wander through eternity,
To perish rather, swallow'd up and lost
In the wide womb of uncreated night, Devoid of sense and motion?”

I have meditated an attempt upon the profession of a lawyer, or of a civil engineer; though what person would afford me any assistance in executing either of these projects, I cannot say. It is doubtful if I can even learn the nature of the obstacles to be overcome, and the recompense of success. This is the most provoking thing of all : yet how to remedy it ? I have thought of asking Mr. Duncan for an introduction to some of his friends in Edinburgh, who might inform me at least upon these points, help me to get books, and show me countenance in other ways that might not interfere with their own convenience. Tell me what you think of this. But do not mention it to Mr. D. ; he might regard it as an opening of the first parallel and that would be a mistake. When (if ever) I shall have convinced myself that it is right to overcome the scruples which one naturally feels against asking such a favour, for the first time in one's life I shall wish to execute the task, without any unnecessary meanness. The minister here is a worthy, kind man : but he has been beset with similar applications ; and I cannot trouble him. Last time I was in Edinburgh, I called at Professor Christison's, with full purpose of talking with him upon this subject : but the good man was already environed with a crowd of hungry schoolmasters. I felt for myself—and made my exit in half an hour ; though not till he had expounded the views of Messieurs Dufief and Sabatier, and discussed the merits of Sir James Mackintosh, the King, the late Lord Hopetoun, Dr. Parr, the Calton-hill observatory, with twenty other things, in a way, which (no offence to the General) I could not think very edifying. Mr. Leslie has already befriended me ; I must allow him to “pursue the labyrinths of Physical research,” without molestation. Yet without some such interference, I must be contented with angels’ visits to the College library, and my society must consist of private teachers and probationers—a class of creatures (I speak it with a sigh) not the least despicable in Edinburgh. Their ideas are silly and grovelling, their minds unvisited by any generous sentiments ; I love them not ; and of course, the feeling will be mutual.

You see, my boy, that my prospects are not the brightest in nature. Yet what shall we say ? Contentment, that little practised virtue, has been inculcated by saint, by savage, and by sage—and by each from a different principle. Do not fear that I shall read you a homily on that hackneyed theme. Simply I wish to tell you, that in days of darkness—for there are days when my support (pride or whatever it is) has enough to do—I find it useful to remember that Cleanthes, whose ὕμνος εἰς τὸν Θεόν may last yet another two thousand years, never murmured, when he laboured by night as a street porter, that he might hear the lectures of Zeno by day; and that Epictetus, the ill-used slave of a cruel tyrant's as wretched minion, wrote that Enchiridion which may fortify the soul of the latest inhabitant of Earth. Besides, though neither of these men had adorned their species, it is morally certain that our earthly joys or griefs can last but for a few brief years; and, though the latter were eternal, complaint and despondency could neither mitigate their intensity nor shorten their duration. Therefore my duty, and that of every man, on this point, is clear as light itself.

Excuse, my dear Mitchell, the egotism of this almost interminable letter. I have few other friends before whom I can unfold my secret soul. Do not say, with the French wit, on aime mieux dire du mal de soi-même, que de n'en point parler. Regard this rather as an auricular confession, intended to answer, with other purposes, that of marshalling my own reasons for my conduct—that I may be the better able to meet the result, whatever it be, with a resolute spirit. I have left myself no room for criticism (falsely so called), or remarks upon your interesting letter. How fully I participate in your feelings with regard to the men of Cambridge will appear from the foregoing pages. Yet never despair. Remember Jeremiah Horrox, John Kepler, Samuel Johnson, and a cloud of other witnesses. Have you advanced far in Gibbon? You would not, or will not, fail to admire the characters of Stilicho, of Aetius, of Boniface, of Belisarius—whilst the threefold coffin of Attila the Hun, with the barbaric splendour of his life and funeral, no less than the boisterous spirit of Alaric the Goth, whose bones yet repose beneath the waves of the Cosenza, might inflame your fancy with martial pomp and circumstance. What think you of Gibbon's views of the habits and opinions of those ages—his understanding—his style? I will not speak of Watson's history of the two Philips—an interesting, clear, well-arranged and rather feeble-minded work; any more than of the Harrington and Ormond of Edgeworth, or the chaotic jumble of Analytical institutions, Poems, Encyclopædias, Reviews, which of late I have grappled withal. I am glad to find you pleased with your Newton—the carriage was 1s. 8d., the residue I keep for you. Of course you will write to me before I leave this place—I say of course. I was going to ask whether our friend Johnstone was in the body—when lo! a letter from him reached me;—it shall be answered, tell him, in due time. I mourn for poor Lewis. Where is his son? Sir Samuel Romilly too! His peer is not within the empire. But I have done. Write (obsecro) in less than a week, to, my dear Mitchell, your faithful friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXVIII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

EDINBURGH, 27th November 1818.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—Those who have never known what it is to buffet with Fortune, and to hear the voice of a friend encouraging them in the strife, cannot understand the pleasure which I felt from reading your letter. It found me on the eve of my departure from Kirkcaldy. The plan of a subscription-school was, according to my expectation, given up for want of subscribers. I was packing my clothes and books, writing directions, settling accounts,—weighing anchor, in short, to venture once again with little ballast, provision or experience, upon the stormy ocean of life ; when your admonitions came to shed a gleam of light athwart my rough and doubtful course. I thank you for them, with all my soul. If I have not done it sooner, or if I do it now in a clumsy way—I desire you to consider the trouble and vexation which a change of place and habits produces : and if this excuse will not satisfy you, add to it, that for some days I have enjoyed very poor health, which two ounces of sulphate of magnesia which I swallowed two hours ago, have not yet tended to diminish.

It would be ridiculous to affect displeasure at your kind violation of my prohibition. You have acted towards me as became a friend. To Mr. Duncan, who possesses the rare talent of conferring obligations without wounding the vanity of him who receives them,—and the still rarer disposition to exercise that talent—all gratitude is due on my part. It is needless to say more about my feelings upon this head. With regard to the abilities which you are kind enough to suppose that I possess for writing in Reviews and Encyclopædias—I have much doubt: I have very little respecting the alacrity with which I should engage in these enterprises. At all events, I am highly indebted for all that has already been done in that matter; and shall receive with great thankfulness the introductory letters which you mention. The countenance and conversation of such a man as Dr. Brewster¹ cannot fail to be both gratifying and instructive to one in my circumstances. If I mistake not, I have seen Mr. Henderson at Ruthwell Manse. His manners seemed to be such as become a gentleman. The information which might be derived from him, concerning the profession of law, is what I earnestly desire.

¹ Sir David Brewster.

Perhaps you are curious to know the state of my feelings at this crisis of my affairs. I need not use many words to describe them. Conceive to yourself a person of my stamp (about which you should know something before this time) loosened from all his engagements with mankind, seated in a small room in S. Richmond Street, revolving in his altered soul the various turns of fate below—whilst every time that the remembrance of his forlorn condition comes across his brain, he silently exclaims, “Why then the world’s mine oyster; which I (not with sword, as Ancient Pistol) will open”—as best I may: and you will have some idea of my situation. I am not unhappy:—for why? I have got Saussure’s Voyages dans les Alpes; and it is my intention to accompany him, before much time shall elapse, to the summit of the Dôle as well as to the Col du Géant. Besides, I have Irving to talk with about chemistry or the moral sublime—Frances Dixon also, and Waugh, to spout poetry, not by weight and measure,—but in a plenteous way. There are others too—a numerous and nameless throng. I saw that admirable creature, Mr. Esbie, some weeks ago at Kirkcaldy. He came in company with one Galloway, a small dogmatical teacher of Mathematics—a wrangler of the first order—of brutal manners, and a terror to those embryo philosophers which (or rather who) frequent the backshop of David Brown. The contrast between this hirsute person and the double-refined travelling tutor was what Mr. E. himself would have called magnifique. I thought of the little lap-dog, the dog of knowledge, which I had seen dancing in a ring with the rugged Russian bear. Esbie seems to have some good nature, and as his vanity, which is very considerable, lies quite in a different direction from one's own vanity

(which in most cases is also considerable), he is, I should think, rather amusing than otherwise. To-day I saw him enter the College-yard—"and surely there never lighted upon this earth, which he scarcely seemed to touch, a more beauteous vision." I then thought (to continue in the words of Burke) that "ten thousand swords (fists rather) would have leapt from their scabbards to avenge even a look that threatened him with insult." But alas! poor Esbie must be content, he thinks, "with some devil of a curacy" as he calls it; though his acquaintance with "the first houses in England" is of the most intimate nature.

I have heard Professor Jameson deliver two lectures. I am doubtful whether I ought to attend his class after all. He is one of those persons whose understanding is over-burthened by their memory. Destitute of accurate science, without comprehension of mind,—he details a chaos of facts, which he accounts for in a manner as slovenly as he selects and arranges them. Yesterday he explained the colour of the atmosphere,—upon principles which argued a total ignorance of dioptrics. A knowledge of the external character of minerals is all I can hope to obtain from him.¹

You will readily believe that I have not read much since I wrote to you. Roscoe's Life of Lorenzo de' Medici—a work concerning which I shall only observe, in the words of the Auctioneer, that it is “well worth any gentleman's perusal”—is the only thing almost that I recollect aught about. I was grieved to read your brief notice of your ill-health. I do hope it is re-established. What says Newton? and Gibbon? Have you given up all thoughts of the Divinity Hall? Though there are few persons on earth I desire as much to see, I do not advise you to prosecute it. From the conversation which we had in the inn at Bassenthwaite Halls, and elsewhere, I judge that you are as unfit as myself for the study of Theology, as they arrogantly name it. Whatever becomes of us, let us never cease to behave like honest men.

¹ Professor Jameson's reputation was very high at this time in Edinburgh. One may learn what was thought of him from Lockhart's account in Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk (i. 250), which were published in 1819. These Letters give an entertaining picture of the Edinburgh of these years, well worth comparing with Carlyle's incidental sketches. Chalmers, Jeffrey, Playfair, Spurzheim, Leslie, Brewster,—all the Edinburgh notabilities—appear in the lively and flippant pages of the brilliant and successful man of the world in different lights and colours from those in which they were seen by the serious, lonely, struggling student.

When did you see Johnstone? I hope you often meet to point out, when other topics fail, the contour of that Alpine range in whose unforgotten bosom we spent some days in so happy a manner. Certainly he will soon hear from me. I intended to have written him long ago.

I must have a letter from you as soon as your good nature will afford me that pleasure. Excuse the dulness of this epistle and its brevity (a most uncommon fault), both of which you will charitably impute to the proper cause. I will try to do better another time. Believe me to be, my dear friend, yours faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

.

XXIX.—To his MOTHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, *Thursday, 17th December 1818.*¹

MY DEAR MOTHER—I expected that the Carrier would have been here before this time, and that consequently I should have had it in my power to give you notice of my condition, without putting you to the expense of postage. But as there is now little probability of his arriving this week, I can no longer delay to answer the letter which I received from my Father a considerable time ago. Few things in the world could give me greater pleasure than to learn that you are all in good health, and that your affairs are in a somewhat prosperous condition. I trust they still continue so. The boys deserve my thanks for the alacrity with which they explored the condition of that same unfortunate box. I call it unfortunate, for upon calling at the person Kay's in the Grass-market here, I found it ill-used in every particular. In the first place, though the carriage, as appeared by the marks upon the lid, had been paid—the poor dog Beck had contrived to make Kay (as a Porter testified) pay it again, inadvertently—and he stoutly refused to part with it, unless he were reimbursed. This, by the way, was the reason why it had never come to Kirkcaldy; all the carriers refusing to take it, because they must first pay the carriage to Edinburgh, which was marked as paid already. So the poor box was left standing for six weeks, in a damp cellar, without any one to claim it. I was forced to comply with Signor Kay's requisition—and upon paying him the 2s. 10d., had my articles brought home at last. The socks fit me well, and altogether are admirable things. The butter also was there undamaged: but the shirts—which your kindness had incited you to make for me—those shirts I was enraged to find all spotted and sprinkled with a black colour—which the body Davie here says is mellemdew—and which will never come out, according to the same authority. I have had them washed; but the blackness remains. Much of it is about the breast, and if it be true that it cannot be erased, I must make night-shirts of them. This cannot be remedied, and therefore ought not to be regretted; but the creature Smith should refund his carriage-money at the least. I find living here very high. An hour ago, I paid my week's bill, which, though 15s. 2d., was the smallest of the three which I have yet discharged. This is an unreasonable sum when I consider the slender accommodation, and the paltry ill-cooked morsel which is my daily pittance. There is also a schoolmaster right over my head, whose noisy brats give me at times no small annoyance. On a given night of the week, he also assembles a select number of vocal performers, whose music (as they charitably name it) is now and then so clamorous, that (when studying a Mathematical theorem) I almost wished the throats of these sweet singers full of molten lead, or any other substance which might stop their braying, for the time. Yet neither can this be avoided. I was through about fifty rooms the other day—only one was offered cheaper and that greatly inferior—so I shall be content till the spring. There is nothing very tragical in all this: yet it is the worst side of the picture. I ought not to forget that I am more healthy than I have been this twelvemonth. I have plenty of time to read, and am not destitute of good society—that of Irving—James Brown, a truly good lad, who was at Mainhill once—Francis Dixon, etc. Also I have three hours of private teaching—at two guineas a month for each hour. The first two hours I got three weeks ago. A young man had been directed to Irving to get lessons in Astronomy—Irving not finding it convenient to supply him, sent him to me: and I engaged immediately. His name is Robertson—he is an officer in the East India Company, and I find him a pleasant youth. I am only sorry that he must leave this place, in a short time, and thus cut off my salary. The other hour, which I undertook ten days ago, is devoted to teach Geometry to an old English (or Jersey) gentleman, called Saumarez, who asked Irving one day in the Natural History class, which I also attend, if he could recommend a mathematical teacher—and was immediately introduced to me. He is a most amusing creature, and the space between 8 and 9 o'clock which I daily spend with him—no less than the arguments we have together in the class, about Newton and natural philosophy—is often the most diverting of the day. He lives at the north end of the New Town, above a mile from this place; and this walk for me, before breakfast (which is of porridge), is another advantage. Robertson lives with his mother, much in the same quarter. I go thither between ten and twelve o'clock. Then comes a walk with Brown or Dixon—or else a bout at reading till two; next the Natural History class till three; then dinner of fish or mutton and roots;—and reading till midnight. This is a picture of my life; and notwithstanding a fair proportion of anticipations and forebodings, I am not at all uncomfortable.

¹ A few sentences from this letter are printed in Froude's Life of Carlyle.

I saw Professor Leslie twice or thrice since I wrote to you. He requested me to attempt a most difficult problem which he was going to put into a book that he is publishing. He had not time for it himself. I wrought at it for a week ; and, notwithstanding several advances, could not do it. The day before yesterday, he advised me to let it alone a while—which I was willing to do ; and then to try it again, which I also intend to do. “ Upon the whole,” said this curious philosopher, “ I see nothing so eligible for you as to learn the engineer business ; and then go to America. Great business there—Swiss gentleman went lately—making a large fortune—many bridges and canals—I must have you introduced to Jardine.” This Jardine is an engineer of this city ; and came from Millhousebridge near Lochmaben—report says he is a conceited disagreeable person. You will start, my dear Mother, at the sound of America. I too had much rather live in my own country ; and lay my bones in the soil which covers those of my Fathers. Nor do I despair of getting a comfortable situation for the exercise of my talents somewhere within this sea-girt isle. On Monday I received a letter from Mr. Duncan of Ruthwell containing three notes of introduction—one to a certain Bailie Waugh, a bookseller of this place who wishes to employ me as a writer in some Review which he is about to commence. I had half an hour's pleasant chat with this Bailie, left my address with him, and went on my way. What the upshot may be I cannot guess. A second letter I delivered to Dr. Brewster, Editor of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia.¹ He received me kindly—took my address—talked with me a while on several subjects—and let me go. The kind minister of Ruthwell had, I understand, written about getting me to write in the Encyclopædia—the Doctor said nothing on that head. No matter. The third letter is to J. A. Henderson, Esq., Advocate, which I have not yet delivered. Perhaps he will inform me about the lawyer business. This law, I sometimes think, is what I was intended for naturally. I am afraid it takes several hundreds to become an Advocate. But for this, I should commence the study of it with great hopes of success. We shall see whether it is possible. One of the first advocates of the day, Forsyth, raised himself from being a disconsolate Preacher to his present eminence. Therefore I entreat you, my Mother, not to be any way uneasy about me. I see none of my fellows with whom I am very anxious to change places. They are mostly older than I by several years, and have as dim prospects generally as need be. Tell the boys to read, and not to let their hearts be troubled for me. Tell them, I am a stubborn dog—and evil fortune shall not break my heart, or bend it either, as I hope. I must write to them and to my Father before long.

¹ Brewster had undertaken the editorship of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia in 1808; the work was not completed till 1830.

I know not how to speak about the washing which you offer so kindly. Surely you thought, five years ago, that this troublesome washing and baking was all over; and now to recommence! I can scarcely think of troubling you. Yet the clothes are ill-washed here, and if the box be going and coming anyway—perhaps you could manage it.

.

But my paper is done. I add only, that with a heartfelt wish for the happiness of you all, I remain, my dear Mother, your affectionate bairn,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

P.S.—I know not whether I mentioned that Mr. Martin,¹ the minister of Kirkcaldy, of his own accord, gave me at my départure a most consolatory certificate—full of encomiums upon talents, morals, etc., which gratified me not a little. He was always kind to me. The favourable opinion of such a man is worth the adverse votes of many ignorant persons. The poor people of Kirkcaldy are ill off, I hear, for a dominie. Charles Melville was here upon the scent lately. There are many good men amongst them. I wish they had a right school.

XXX.—To Mr. JAMES JOHNSTONE.

EDINBURGH, 8th January 1819.

MY DEAR JOHNSTONE—. . . I am grieved to see your embryo resolution of going to America. It is always a mournful thing to leave our country ; to a man of sensibility and reflection it is dreadful. I speak not of that feeling which must freeze the soul of an emigrant, when landing on the quay of Boston or New York, he reflects that the wide Atlantic is roaring between him and every heart that cares for his fate. But to snap asunder, for ever, the associations that bind us to our native soil ; to forget the Hampdens, the Sydneys, the Lockes, the Stewarts, the Burnses,—or to remember them only as men of a foreign land ; to change our ideas of human excellence ; to have our principles, our prejudices supplanted ; to endure the rubs which hard unkindness will have in store for us ; to throw aside old friendships, and with a seared heart to seek for new ones—all this is terrible. And after all what would you do there ? To teach is misery in the old world or the new : and perhaps (if it must be so) England is as fair a field for it as the Union. I entreat you, my dear friend, to lay aside this enterprise—at least for the present. I look upon emigration as a fearful destiny—Not more fearful, I grant, than others that might be imagined; than such failure, for instance, as might call forth the pity of those who love us (I was about to add—and the triumph of those who hate us: but it is a paltry sentiment to care for that;—if it exists within me I would wish to hide it both from you and myself); but thank Heaven things are not yet come to this. Consider the talents you possess—the classical, scientific, historical, above all, the agricultural knowledge, which you have acquired; look around you; continue to improve your mind in patience, and do not yet imagine that, in our own country the gates of preferment are shut against you. It will give satisfaction to me, and perhaps some relief to your own mind, to have your situation and views distinctly explained in your next letter. Write to me without reserve—as to one who can be indifferent to nothing which concerns you.

¹ The Rev. Mr. Martin's house had been hospitably open to Irving and Carlyle while they were living at Kirkcaldy, and Irving afterward married his eldest daughter. The minister was "a clear-minded, brotherly, well-intentioned man."—Reminiscences, i. 117.

It is superfluous to say that I have bid farewell to Fife. My resolution was taken without advice, because none was to be had; but not without long and serious meditation. I could not leave Kirkcaldy but with regret. There are in it many persons of a respectable—several of an exemplary character; and had the tie which united us been of a less irritating nature, my time might have been spent very happily among them. At present my prospects are as dim, and my feelings of course nearly as uncomfortable as they have been at any period of my life. About the end of 1816, I remember informing you, that, in the space of two years, my views of human life had considerably altered. A similar period has again elapsed and brought with it a change less marked indeed, but not less real. Till not very long ago, I imagined my whole duty to consist in thinking and endeavouring. It now appears that I ought not only to suffer but to act. Connected with mankind by sympathies and wants which experience never ceases to reveal, I now begin to perceive that it is impossible to attain the solitary happiness of the Stoic—and hurtful if it were possible.¹ How far the creed of

¹ Rien ne doit tant diminuer la satisfaction que nous avons

Epictetus may require to be modified, it is not easy to determine ; that it is defective seems pretty evident. I quit the stubborn dogma, with a regret heightened almost to remorse ; and feel it to be a desire rather than a duty to mingle in the busy current which is flowing past me, and to act my part before the not distant day arrive, when they who seek me shall not find me. What part I shall act is still a mystery. . . . Your faithful friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

P.S.—I forgot to say (what was indeed of no consequence) that I spent, along with Irving, the Christmas holidays in Fife. They were the happiest, for many reasons which I cannot at this time explain, that for a long space have marked the tenor of my life.

XXXI.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

EDINBURGH, 15th February 1819.

MY DEAR FRIEND—Although well aware of de nous-mêmes, que de voir que nous désapprouvons dans un temps ce que nous approuvions dans un autre, is the unpleasant but faithful observation of La Rochefoucault.—T. C.

the propensity which exists in men to speak more about themselves than others care for hearing, yet, as you have hitherto been the participator of all my schemes, I venture to solicit your forbearance and advice, at a time when I need them as much perhaps as I have ever done.

My situation may be briefly explained. All the plans that I have formed for succeeding in any profession, have involved the idea of subsisting in the interim by writing; and every project of this kind which I have devised, up to the present date, has been frustrated by my inability to procure books either for criticising or consulting. I have, it is true, the privilege of appearing on the floor of the College library, to ask for any book,—to wait about an hour and then to find it—not in. But this is of small advantage. My private teaching came to an end about a month ago: and at this time, except a small degree of attention which I pay to the shadow rather than to the substance of Mineralogy—for which science it is perhaps less surprising than unlucky that my unsettled condition and my indifferent state of health have left me little enthusiasm; excepting also a slight tincture of the German language which I am receiving from one Robt. Jardine of Göttingen (or rather Applegarth), in return for an equally slight tincture of the French which I communicate,—there is no stated duty whatever for me to perform. The source of that considerable quantity of comfort, which I enjoy, in these circumstances, is twofold. First, there is the hope of better days, which I am not yet old and worn enough to have quite laid aside. This cheerful feeling is combined with a portion of the universal quality which we ourselves name firmness, others obstinacy; the quality which I suppose to be the fulcrum of all Stoical philosophy; and which, when the charmer Hope has utterly forsaken us, may afford a grim support in the extreme of wretchedness. But there are other emotions which, at times, arise; when, in my solitary walks round the Meadows or Calton Hill my mind escapes from the smoke and tarnish of those unfortunate persons, with whom it is too much my fortune to associate,— emotions which if less fleeting, might constitute a principle of action at once rational and powerful. It is difficult to speak upon these subjects without being ridiculous if not hypocritical. Besides, the principles to which I allude, being little else than a more intense perception of certain truths universally acknowledged, to translate them into language would degrade them to the rank of truisms. Therefore unwillingly I leave you to conjecture. It is probable, however, that your good-natured imagination might lead you to overrate my resources if I neglected to inform you that, on the whole, my mind is far from philosophical composure. The vicissitudes of our opinions do not happen with the celerity or distinctness of an astronomical phenomenon : but it is evident that my mind, at the present, is undergoing sundry alterations. When I review my past conduct it seems to have been guided by narrow and defective views, and (worst of all) by lurking, deeply-lurking affectation. I could have defended these views by the most paramount logic : but what logic can withstand Experience ? This is not the first, and, if I live long, it will not be the last of my revolutions. Thus—velut unda supervenit undam—error succeeds to error; and thus while I seek a rule of life—life itself is fast flying away. At the last, perhaps my creed may be found to resemble too nearly the memorable Tristrapedia of Walter Shandy, of which the minute and indubitable directions for Tristram's baby-clothes were finished when Tristram was in breeches.

But I forget the aphorism with which I began my letter. Here, at least, let me conclude this long-winded account of my affairs; and request from you as particular an account of your own. We cannot help one another, my friend, but mutual advice and encouragement may easily be given and thankfully received. Will you go to Liverpool or Bristol or any-whither, and institute a "classico-mathematical Academy"? or what say you to that asylum or rather hiding-place for poverty and discontent, America? To be fabricating lock No. 8, among the passes of the Alleghany!

Some nights ago, by the kindness of Dr.

Brewster, I was present at a meeting of the Royal Society. It is pleasant to see persons met together—when their object even professes to be the pursuit of knowledge. But if any one should expect to find, in George Street, an image of the first Royal Society,—when Newton was in the chair, and Halley at the table,—he cannot (unless his fancy be the stronger) fail of disappointment. He will find indeed a number of clean, well-dressed (some of them able-bodied) men : but in place of witnessing the invention of fluxions or the discovery of gravitation, he may chance to learn the dimensions of a fossil stick, or hear it decided that a certain little crumb of stone is neither to be called mesotype nor stilbite. This (a critic would say) has very much the look of drivelling. But pauca verba. —Dr. B. is said to be almost the only efficient member of this philosophical guild. I may mention (though this has nothing earthly to do with it) that I have seen the Doctor twice since my first visit ; that I have met with a kind reception, and found instruction as well as entertainment in his conversation.

In conformity with ancient custom, I ought now to transmit you some of my studies. But I have too much conscience to dilate upon this subject. Besides, it is not so easy to criticise the brilliant work of Madame de Staël—Considerations sur quelques Événemens de la Révolution—as to tell you, what I learnt from a small Genevese attending Jameson's class, that she was very ugly and very immoral—yet had fine eyes, and was very kind to the poor people of Coppet and the environs. But she is gone; and with all her faults she possessed the loftiest soul of any female of her time. Upon the same authority, I inform you that Horace Benedict Saussure (whose beautiful Voyages dans les Alpes I have not yet finished) died twenty years ago; but Theodore, his son, is still living. Moreover Sismondi (another member of the Geneva Academy) is un petit homme, vieux, mais vif, très vif. I read Bailly's Memoires d'un Témoin de la Révolution, with little comfort. The book is not ill-written: but it grieved me to see the august historian of astronomy, the intimate of Kepler, Galileo, and Newton, "thrown into tumult, raptured, or alarmed," at the approbation or the blame of Parisian tradesmen—not to speak of the "pauvres ouvriers," as he fondly names the dogs du faubourg St. Antoine. With regard to Mineralogy—the maxim of Corporal Nym is again applicable. Peace be to Brochant, Brongniart, and "the illustrious Werner!" It is a mournful study—and the Teacher, "a cold long-winded native of the deep." Do you wish to know the important fact, that the stone which I brought from Helvellyn is feldspar-porphry? Skiddaw is of Thonschiefer (clay-schistus); and I firmly believe that the other rocks of that wild country have names equally beautiful and descriptive. Of their properties I am forbid to know anything. En-vent-on la cause? The "external characters" are reckoned enough in the school of Freyberg.

Upon a cool comparison of dates, I find that if I carry this letter to the post-office to-night, you may have it on Monday. The thing is then resolved upon. But it verges upon midnight; and it is high time to conclude the useless labours of the day—on which I have walked to Dalkeith for the purpose of exercise,—heard a heart-rending sermon—and have not studied the moon's erection in Lalande. When am I to hope for an answer? It may be short or long—it will not fail to comfort the soul of, my dear Mitchell, your faithful friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXXII.—From his FATHER.

MAINHILL, 20th February 1819.

DEAR SON—We received the box with your letters in it, which we were very glad to see, and you said it was a long time since you had a letter from your Mother or me, as Sandy has been much engaged this week and the waffler¹ did not get his cart home till Monday, and Sandy set out for Dumfries Fair on Tuesday morning, and did not come home till Thursday night, and on Friday night he was at the library, as their Books was come home, and he got Guy Mannering for the first, and we think in time there will be a good library; however that may be, I thought I would send you a scrawl. I have nothing to write you worth reading, but I thought you would be disappointed if you got the box and no letter in it, but I can say we are all in good health at present. Your Mother is hearty, and baking you two or three cakes and sorting your shirts and stockings, and in short we are very comfortable, having plenty of meal and potatoes. We have a good deal of corn this year, more than we had last year, and I think we will can pay the Rent this year at any time we think proper. We are well forward with ploughing, as there has been very little frost to stop the Ploughs this winter. . . . I must have done, but not without telling you that the little Lassies are all running about, and Jamie and John are a good deal bigger since you saw them, and Sandy and your Mother agree very well now, though we have many arguments about Religion, but none in ill-nature; but I add no more, but all the family's kind respects to you, and I remain, dear Son, your affectionate and loving Father,

¹ The carrier's nickname, whiffler, loiterer.

JAS. CARLYLE.

XXXIII.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 23d February 1819.¹

(Mrs. Scott's, 15 Carnegie Street.)

MY DEAR BROTHER—I sit down to write a letter to you, at this late hour of the night, in order to inform you of some steps which I have taken since you last heard from me. The uncomfortableness of the person Davie's lodging has been frequently alluded to in our correspondence. Vermin of various sorts, which haunted the beds of that unfortunate woman, together with sluttishness and a lying, thievish, disposition with which she was afflicted—at length became intolerable; and on Wednesday, I told the creature that her "ticket-board" (fatal signal!) must once more be hoisted—in plain words, that I was about to forsake her house entirely. She received the news with considerable dudgeon; but as my words to her were calm and few as well as emphatic, she made no remonstrance. To secure another room was my next care. John Forrest's place, which has few recommendations except the excellent demeanour of Mrs. F., was engaged, I found, till the beginning of April. Of the other places at which I called, some were dirty, others dear, others had a suspicious look ; none were suitable. In short, not to trouble you with the detail of these pitiful affairs, I saw no better plan than to propose a junction with one Hill (a Nephew of Mrs. Irving's—Bogside—from Panteth Hill, Mouswald), who is here studying law. He is a harmless kind of youth—and had a clean landlady, who kept two rooms with a bed in each, which we could get for 8s. per week. My proposal was immediately accepted of : and I removed hither yesterday (Monday) evening. This comradeship is not altogether to my liking, as I fear it may encumber my researches ; but when I consider the saving of 3s. 6d. per week (not to speak of that which arises from two eating together)—as well as the neatness and comfort which seems to pervade this place, I am induced to put up with the other inconveniences till April, when I may take Forrest's room, or have a choice of others. Besides, we stipulated to have a fire in each room when we liked at night, so that I can retire to this small chamber whenever I have anything particular to investigate. The chamber, to say truth, is not many square feet in extent, yet it will do excellently well for the short season during which I shall occupy it. Flitting is an operation which has, of late years, become very irksome to me ; so you are not to expect that, in this letter, I can give you any very interesting remarks : forasmuch as I have even now scarcely ended the arrangement of my goods. I write principally to send you my address, and to request an answer from some of you.

¹ A brief extract from this letter is given by Mr. Froude in his Life.

I know it will please you all to hear that my health is good. Whenever the morning is fair, I walk before breakfast ; and after finishing the German at eleven o'clock, I generally stroll for an hour or so about the environs of this city—a practice which, I know well, is the only plan for securing vigorous health. There is a young man, Ferguson (a cousin of the Celt Maclaren, whom you dined with at Dysart),¹ formerly Irving's assistant at Kirkcaldy—who, being disengaged at that hour, is as glad as I to escape from the sin and sea-coal of Edinburgh, and often accompanies me. He is a sensible, pleasant man, three or four years older than myself. On Tuesday last, when he and I were returning into the town from our excursion, we met Dr. Brewster, in company with two men of note. The Doctor stopped to tell me that he had got a paper on Chemistry written (in French) by Berzelius, professor of that science at Stockholm—which was to be published in April:—would I translate it? I answered in the affirmative; and next day went over to get the paper in question. It consists of six long sheets, written in a cramp hand, and in a very diffuse style. I have it more than half-done. The labour of writing it down is the principal one. In other respects there is no difficulty. I do not expect great remuneration for this thing; but as I am anxious to do it pretty well, it interrupts my other pursuits a little. Before I began

¹ A village near Kirkcaldy, now almost joined to it.

it, I was busied in preparing to write about some other thing; but what will be the upshot of it I cannot say. I tell you all these things, because I know that nothing which concerns me is matter of indifference to you.

About a week ago, I very briefly discussed an hour of private teaching. A man in the New Town applied to one Nicol, public teacher of Mathematics here, for a person to give instruction in Arithmetic or something of that sort. Nicol spoke of me, and I was in consequence directed to call upon the man next morning. I went at the appointed hour, and after waiting a few minutes, was met by a stout impudent-looking man—with red whiskers—having very much the air of an attorney, or some creature of that sort. As our conversation may give you some insight into these matters, I report the substance of it. “I am here,” I said after making a slight bow, which was just perceptibly returned, “by the request of Mr. Nicol to speak with you, sir, about a mathematical teacher whom he tells me you want.” “Aye. What are your terms?” “Two guineas a month, for each hour." "Two guineas!! for private teaching—that is perfectly extravagant!" "I believe it to be the rate at which every teacher of respectability in Edinburgh officiates; and I know it to be the rate below which I never officiate." "That won't do for my friend." "I am sorry that nothing less will do for me. Good morning." And I retired with considerable deliberation. The time has been when I should have vapoured not a little, at being so cavalierly treated by a wretched person of this description. But it is altered now. I reflected only that this man wanted (and that was natural) to have his business done cheap; and that his ill-breeding was his misfortune perhaps as much as crime. A day may come when I shall look back upon these things with a smile,—if that day should never come, the maxim of the poet is not more trite than true—

"Honour and shame from no condition rise; Act well your part: there all the honour lies."

This world, my boy, is but a fight at best;
and though the battle go against us, yet he who quits him like a man is an object upon which (as an old philosopher has written) superior natures delight to look.

Last week I received an umbrella which I had left in Fife, and a kind letter from Mr. Swan. If ever I come to anything, that is one person whom I shall remember.

.

Tell me how Father, Mother, and all the rest of you are doing. Give my kindest love to all about the house, and believe me to be, my dear Brother, yours faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXXIV.—From his MOTHER and his Sister MARGARET.

MAINHILL, 25th March 1819.

DEAR TOM—It is a long time since I wrote you a single line, and I am blundering already, as I am very desirous to know how you are coming on. Tell me all about it. Do you sit late? Do you read a Chapter or two every night? I hope you do, and pray for a blessing on all your undertakings. O seek while you have time to know Him whom to know is life eternal ; our time is short and also uncertain. I am sorry to inform you that my sister Mary died last Sabbath night. We must all follow in a little, and O that we were wise to think on our latter end. I beg, Tom, you do not sit late to injure your health ; but I will say no more, but hope you will excuse this scrawl, and I am, your affectionate Mother, PEGGY C.

MY DEAR BROTHER—We received your letter, and we were very happy to hear that you were in good health. There is nothing that is worth telling you about. I have read Guy Mannering, and I liked it very well. I have read the Indian Cottage, and I liked it very much. I am reading the History of England, and I have got to the reign of George III. I will have done, as Sandy has to go to the clachan¹ this night. I add no more, but that I remain your

MARGARET CARLYLE.

¹ Village.

XXXV.—TO ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 29th March 1819.

MY DEAR BROTHER—I snatch a hurried hour from the German lesson, to answer your kind and entertaining epistle, which reached me this forenoon. I need not say how pleasing it is to me to learn that you are all in good bodily health and comfortable spirits. The most important part of my task will be accomplished, when I have assured you that the same is the case with me. I still walk out before breakfast—and for an hour or two after; of which practice I find the beneficial effects in an increased appetite for victual, and a general vigour of body. I have no doubt that two or three months of summer exercise will completely restore this my digestive apparatus (as our Professor calls it) to that state of activity which a person at my age, not addicted to excesses of any kind, and gifted with a sound constitution, ought naturally to expect. . . .

I am glad to understand that the library is in a prosperous state. It is to be hoped that our native village will no longer be the scorn of neighbouring districts, for its deficiency in this particular.

You are very right in stating that the Abbé Raynal is rash in some of his conjectures. He was a jesuit priest in his time; but afterwards quarrelled with them—renounced their society, and with it, all moderation in treating of their religion. He was obliged to leave France for his opinions, and resided for a time in England, and lastly in the Netherlands. The man seems to have had a fiery temper; and it is only for the facts that his books contain, that any one can respect them. There is no wonder that you feel it impossible to find much time for reading in the present season. Keep doing a little at your hours of relaxation—both in writing and reading; and you will never repent it. In reading Raynal, you will, of course, attend to the Geography of the countries.

What ails that indolent young person, Doil, or more properly speaking, Jack, that he will not write? If I had any time, I would send him a letter this very night.

With respect to my occupations at this period; they are not of the most important nature. Berzelius' paper is printed. I was this day correcting the proof-sheet. The translation looks not very ill in print. I wish I had plenty more of a similar kind to translate: and good pay for doing it. Let us wait a while. I am still at the German, as I hinted above. My teacher is not a man (any more than he was a boy) of brilliant parts; but we go on in a loving way together—and he gives me the pronunciation correctly, I suppose; I am able to read books, now, with a dictionary. At present I am reading a stupid play of Kotzebue's—but to-night I am to have the history of Frederick the Great from Irving. I will make an awfu' struggle to read a good deal of it and of the Italian in summer—when at home. . . .

There is nothing new here that I wot of—fierce sort of weather, which I daresay is no stranger to you. How do the farming operations proceed? I hope to help you at the hay-time. But time is our tedious scroll should now have ending. I am always, my dear Boy, yours faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXXVI.—To his MOTHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, Monday (29th March), 1819.¹

MY DEAR MOTHER—I am so much obliged to you for the affectionate concern which you express for me in that brief letter—that I cannot delay to send you a few words by way of reply.² I need not repeat what I have already told to Sandy, who will be glad to communicate it, that I am in good health. If I continue to walk, I shall become very strong shortly. I was affected by the short notice you give me of Aunt Mary's death, and the short reflection with which you close it. It is true, my dear Mother, that "we must all soon follow her"—such is the unalterable and not unpleasing doom

¹ The larger part of this interesting letter is given by Mr. Froude, Life, i. 62.

² Mr. Froude prints this sentence as follows: "I am so much obliged to you for the affectionate concern which you express for me in that long letter, that I cannot delay to send you a few brief words by way of reply."

of men—then it is well for those who, at that awful moment which is before every one, shall be able to look back with calmness, and forward with hope. But I need not dwell upon this solemn subject—it is familiar to the thoughts of every one who has any thought.

I am rather afraid that I have not been quite regular in reading that best of books which you recommended to me. However, last night I was reading upon my favourite Job; and I hope to do better in time to come. I entreat you to believe that I am sincerely desirous of being a good man; and though we may differ in some few unimportant particulars, yet I firmly trust that the same Power which created us with imperfect faculties will pardon the errors of every one (and none are without them) who seeks truth and righteousness with a simple heart.

You need not fear my studying too much. In fact, my prospects are so unsettled that I do not often sit down to books with all the zeal that I am capable of. You are not to think I am fretful. I have long accustomed my mind to look upon the future with a sedate aspect ; and, at any rate, my hopes have never yet failed me. A French author (D'Alembert, one of the few persons who deserve the honourable epithet of honest man) whom I was lately reading, remarks that one who devotes his life to learning ought to carry for his motto Liberty, Truth, Poverty ; for he that fears the latter can never have the former. . This should not prevent one from using every honest effort to attain a comfortable situation in life ; it says only that the best is dearly bought by base conduct, and the worst is not worth mourning over. But I tire you, I doubt. We shall speak about all these matters more fully in summer. For I am meditating just now to come down to stay awhile with you, accompanied with a cargo of books—Italian, German, and others. You will give me yonder little room—and you will 'waken me every morning about 5 or 6 o'clock—then such study. I shall delve in the yard too ; and in a word become not only the wisest but the strongest man in those regions. This is all claver, but it pleases one. The young man Murray (with whom I used to correspond) informs me that he thinks of going to teach and preach in the island of Man : and invites me to spend a month or two with [him]. Perhaps it would be well to go. But we shall talk about all this afterwards.

If the carrier do not come before a fortnight, you may direct the box to me at Forrest's. I long to have some cakes. The last, I think, were the best I ever ate. The butter you will be astonished to learn is nearly done. I have no doubt that it has been filched : and besides Hill has eaten of it since I came, having given me meal in return. If you send any, let it be a pound or so. I am reduced to this part of the sheet [the first page, above the date] to subscribe myself, my dear Mother, yours most affectionately,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XXXVII.—From his MOTHER.¹

MAINHILL, 10th April 1819.

DEAR SON—I received your letter gladly,

¹ Printed in part, and with errors, in Life, i. 63.

and was happy to hear of your welfare. We are all about our ordinary way, thank God!

Oh, my dear, dear son, I would pray for a blessing on your learning. I beg you with all the feeling of an affectionate mother you would study the Word of God, which He has graciously put in our hands. Oh, that it may powerfully reach our hearts, that we may discern it in its true light. God made man after His own image, therefore he behoved to be without any imperfect faculties. Beware, my dear son, of such thoughts; let them not dwell on your mind. God forbid! But I daresay you will not can read this scrawl. I have sent you a few cakes and a little butter. I will send you more next time. Send the box back with the carrier. I would advise you to come home early in season. I know it would be for your health, and it is surely very necessary. Do send me a long letter and tell me when you will be home, and all your news. I am in a hurry, as you may see by blunders I have [made]. I hope you will overlook them, and I am [your] affectionate mother,

MARGARET CARLYLE.

P.S.—Do make religion your great study, Tom ; if you repent it, I will bear the blame for ever.

XXXVIII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

MAINHILL, 31st May 1819.

MY DEAR FRIEND—In compliance with your request, I transmit to you, by the medium of our dearly beloved Johnstone, the information which I have gleaned respecting your Brother at St. John's,—and the plan of our correspondence during the summer. It is the rainy evening of a dull day, which I have spent in reading a little of Klopstock's Messias (for the man Jardine, who broke his engagement); and in looking over the inflated work of Squire Bristed on America and her Resources.¹ "Vivacity," therefore, on my part, is quite out of the question. But without further preface. . . .

I have done, as usual, almost nothing since

¹ This book, which made some noise at the time, was by the Rev. John Bristed, a clergyman of the Church of England, who settled in America.

we parted. Some one asked me with a smile, of which I knew not the meaning, if I would read that book, putting into my hands a volume of Rousseau's Confessions. It is perhaps the most remarkable tome I have ever read. Except for its occasional obscenity, I might wish to see the remainder of the book; to try, if possible, to connect the character of Jean Jacques with my previous ideas of human nature. To say he was mad were to cut the knot without loosing it. At any rate, what could have induced any mortal, mad or wise, to recollect and delineate such a tissue of vulgar debauchery, false-heartedness and misery, is quite beyond my comprehension. If we regret our exclusion from that Gallic constellation, which has set, and found no successor to its brilliancy—the Memoirs of Marmontel or Rousseau's Confessions should teach a virtuous Briton to be content with the dull sobriety of his native country. I will not speak of the Abbé Raynal: of others I have nothing to say.

It is late; the husbandmen of this rustic mansion are all sunk in profound repose: why should I longer wake? A slender steed is to be saddled for me to-morrow by six o'clock—whereupon I design to ride with this sheet to Johnstone at Bogside—an important errand, you will say. Meanwhile, Good-night. Ever yours,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

.

XXXIX.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

MAINHILL, 14th July 1819.

I have not taken up the pen, my dear Mitchell, because of being smit with the love of sacred letter-writing; but simply to acquit me of a debt, which for some time has lain rather heavy on my conscience. An ancient sage philosopher has said that nothing should be done invita Minerva; my respect for antiquity is very considerable; but without infringing such precepts, which laziness also raises her amiable voice to applaud, my terrestrial exploits would quickly have a close. After all, this communication by letter gives occasion to many squabbles between the moral and the active powers : I wish from my soul some less laborious mode of friendly intercourse could be devised. Much may be done in the flight of ages. I despair of steam indeed ; notwithstanding its felicitous application to so many useful purposes : but who can limit the undiscovered agents with which Knowledge is yet to enrich Philanthropy? Charming prospect for the dull, above all, the solitary dull of future times ! Small comfort for us, however, who in no great fraction of one age shall need to care nothing about the matter. But wherefore whine ? Employing rather our own very limited gifts, agamus pingui Minervâ, ut aiunt—since we can have no other. The best quality which I can communicate to my narrative of my journey to Cumberland is extreme brevity. In fact, however strongly a love of the sublime might tempt me to renew the kind anxiety you felt on our account, the love of truth, which is or ought to be more powerful, compels me to declare that nothing dangerous or wonderful occurred. Maugre the predictions of your light-bodied grocer, the Skinburness wherry buffeted the billows of the Solway, as proudly as ever the Bucentaur did those of the unquiet Adriatic. We had not even the dubious pleasure of being frightened. A poor Cumbrian statesman, however, enjoyed a more spirit-stirring fortune. Unused to his situation, he cast a penetrating glance upon "the secrets of the hoary deep;" his visage became pallid and elongated; and when, turning round, he noticed the entrance of a spoonful of spray—"Lock," he exclaimed in a sepulchral tone, "Lock prasarve us! see as it's coomin' jain' in theare!"¹ But the lapse of two hours delivered him from all his terrors. On arriving at Workington next morning, the Severn, we were told, was not to proceed on her voyage for a week. Though wishing to enjoy the melancholy satisfaction of seeing Johnstone fairly under way;² yet, when Friday

¹ See how it is coming rushing in there.

² Mr. Johnstone was about to sail for Nova Scotia, where, at Annapolis Royal, he was to be tutor in the family of a Mr. Ritchie. Mitchell, in a letter of 23d April 1819 says, "Johnstone would rival Moses if he were living, being by far the meekest man in these times. Like Kilmeny, he is as pure as pure can be; like Nicodemus [sic] he is one in whom there is no guile."

came, and (Harrington, Whitehaven, Cocker-mouth, Crummock Water, etc., being visited) his day of sailing was still at a considerable distance—the opportunity of a Dumfries sloop induced me to take farewell of our friendly emigrant. What my feelings were that afternoon, I need not describe. To some days of mournful excitement, a sort of stupor had succeeded, which the noise of two half-civilised shipmen and the task of guessing at some stanzas of Tasso were little calculated to dispel. By this time, poor James is most probably inspecting the rugged shores of Fundy Bay. Let us hope that his talents, and those virtues which are their modest adornment, will secure, from the Acadians, that affection and esteem which all who know him have never failed to pay. I do not wish you to convince me that we three shall never meet again under more benign auspices.

Since my return, except one journey to Dumfries, which I undertook for the purpose of engaging a supply of poetry, reviews, and such small gear, during my continuance in these parts,—I have not been four miles from home. Jardine gives me a solitary lesson each week in German, which I repay by one in French. Of Italian nothing should be said: and with respect to Lesage's Theory of Attraction,¹ my efforts are feeble and far between. I know not if there be a Goddess of Sloth—though considering that this of all our passions is the least turbulent and most victorious, it could not without partiality be left destitute. But if there be, she certainly looks on with an approving smile—when in a supine posture I lie for hours with my eyes fixed upon the pages of Lady Morgan's France or the travels of Faujas de Saint-Fond²—my mind seldom taking the pains even to execrate the imbecile materialism, the tawdry gossiping of the former, or to pity the infirm speculations and the already antiquated Mineralogy of the latter. What shall I say to the woebegone Roderick, last of the Goths; and others of a similar stamp? They go through my brain as light goes through an achromatic telescope. When even this task becomes tiresome; or when the need of exercise (which I never neglect for a day with impunity) induces me to take the fields; I saunter about, building deceitful hopes; or when otherwise disposed, indulging an obdured recklessness, which I am apt enough to dignify with the name of patience. Do you know of a more edifying life? Seriously it becomes you, as my Father Confessor, to administer an appropriate rebuke.

¹ Lesage's Traité de Physique Mécanique was published in 1818.

² Probably Voyage en Angleterre, en Écosse et aux îles Hébrides, par Faujas de Saint-Fond, Paris, 1797.

I am glad to hear of your innocent enjoyments. Malcolm Laing produced in me, some years since, an opinion of Ossian similar to yours;¹ from which indeed I do not recollect of hearing any but one person dissent. The exception in question was an Aboriginal from the edge of Mid-Lorn, whom I met with last Winter. Some two hundred Latin vocables, which he had picked up at St. Andrews, seemed only to have strengthened his conviction of the Gael's infinite superiority in every department of Nature and Art. The mention of the sledges-cars, the itch, the ignorance of his Celtic kinsmen was a piercing thrust, which could not be parried by the barrenness and altitude of the highland hills, since Switzerland was ready with her Alps to oppose his Grampians, and with her Zwingles, her Gessners, her Hallers, Eulers, Bernouillis, to eclipse his solitary Fergusson and Maclaurin. Poor Pseudo-Ossian was silenced as easily by the intrepid Orkney man; and this fervid patriot, after an hour of torture, uttered a keen vituperation on Malcolm and me for being "Mongrels of the plain," which shut the scene. "The schoolmaster of Badenoch," like every dog, has had his day.

¹ "I have just been reading," Mitchell had written in his last letter, "Malcolm Laing's dissertation on the authenticity of Ossian's Poems, which seems to prove beyond the possibility of a doubt that these productions existed nowhere but in the brain of the Schoolmaster of Badenoch. M'Pherson's life in his Son-in-law's [Dr. Brewster's] Encyclopædia gives us to understand nearly the same thing, and I confess to you that I feel a sort of secret pleasure in beholding lying vanities like these exposed to public indignation and contempt. I would be glad to know your opinion on this subject."

You speak very much at your ease about visiting me in—a few weeks! I should lose patience, but there is one sad and sole relief—

if the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet knows what course to take. I was going to say one of these Saturdays, but, since I began to write, a letter from Dr. Brewster has arrived, which will very possibly bring me over on Saturday first. It is about that calculating Geo. Ross; and I must see Mr. Duncan. The letter has already spent a week upon the road, and there is no time to lose. Expect me therefore, unless "Diana in the shape of rain"¹ prevent me and my poor sheltly from travelling. O! that I saw the "imp of fame" wherewith poor Murray is in travail!

¹ The allusion to "Diana" as an obstruction in one shape or another, was one that Carlyle made more than once in later years. See his letter to Emerson of 13th May 1835, and his letter to me in 1874, cited in a note to the letter to Emerson in the published Correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson, i. 69. But his memory, usually of extraordinary accuracy, had in this, through all his life, played him false. The allusion was derived from Hudibras. But in Hudibras it is "Pallas," not "Diana," who intervenes to hinder the intent of the knight.

" But Pallas came in shape of rust,
And 'twixt the spring and hammer thrust
Her Gorgon shield, which made the cock Stand stiff, as 'twere transform'd to stock."

Hudibras, Part i. Canto ii. 781-784.

"The Stewartry."¹ But I have done.—Yours,
my dear Mitchell, in all sincerity of heart,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XL.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 11th November 1819.

MY DEAR BROTHER—At length I have leisure to devote a few minutes to the duty of detailing the particulars of my history, since our parting on the summit of Ericstane. . . .

I am seated in the back-room of a Mrs. Thomson (wife of a Tailor), which I rent at the rate of 6s. per week, fire included. This person seems to have a good character in the neighbourhood; and from the few symptoms I have yet been able to observe, it appears likely that I shall be very snug here. The room is not large, but it is clean,—and the neat little landlady says it is perfectly free of smoke and of most detested bugs.

¹ The Stewartry of Kirkcudbright. This, in reference to Murray's Literary History of Galloway, published in 1822: "valuable but undeservedly neglected," Lowndes calls it.

Thus, my dear Jack, have I written for thy friendly perusal a full account of my transactions up to this date. The Waffler (well he deserves that nom de guerre !) is not yet come to town ; so that being unable to transact any business, I have full leisure to reflect upon every part of my condition. Pretty strong in body, and capable, as I know, of vigorous effort, I am far from despairing. However, as I have nothing new to tell you upon this subject, I forbear to discuss it further for the present. Let us be contented, my bonny boy, prudent, active, resolute in improving every advantage which our situation affords—and moderate success is hardly doubtful.

9 o'clock P.M.—After an interval of five hours, spent in reading the Edinburgh Review, and executing various commissions, I resume my lucubrations. The unhappy carrier is not come. What can it be that keeps him? Is his steed foundered—or himself overpowered with liquor? Alas! poor Rose!

At this time, I guess, Alick and the rest of you are seated around the room-fire—each pursuing his respective study. Good luck to you all! Be diligent and you will not miss your reward. Tell the small childer that I expect copies from them all, next box,—letters from all that have any powers of diction, and have advanced beyond the strokes in the art of writing.

Having scarcely spoken to any one since my arrival, I have none of that much-coveted commodity, news, to send you. The burghers of this city are, for most part, minding their private affairs; and the few of them who take any share in public transactions, are occupied, as elsewhere, in talking about the massacre of Manchester, and the foolish Carlile's conduct at his trial. The distress under which the universal kingdom suffers seems not to be felt in Edinburgh—to the extent that it is likely ere long to reach. Already, however, there is much poverty among the lowest orders; and the issue of this crisis seems anxiously anticipated by all. For the rest, dandies and cattle of that stamp are still in considerable force;

but you and I have other things to do than take up our time with them.

Have you got Hume yet? Does Geo. Johnston come to get his French lesson from you? Try the Latin, if he come: you are sure to make progress in it; most probably it will turn to good account for you, and any way, it is a wholesome adage that says: Can do is easily carried about with one. Again let me renew my often repeated desire that you will punctually attend to your writing. I must send you lines—unless I forget—as I did to give you the money last Tuesday 'till I was several miles from you, when it was utterly useless to deplore my negligence. Send me your copy to inspect any way. I finish, my dear Jack, with subscribing myself, thy affectionate brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XLI.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

EDINBURGH, 18th November 1819.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—Without reluctance, I push aside the massy quarto of Millar on the English government,¹ to perform the more pleasing duty of writing a few lines to you, by the conveyance of Mr. Duncan. No material event has been added to my history since the day when I parted with you at the avenue of Cummertrees: but by scribbling upon some portion of this sheet, I expect to secure the advantage of hearing from you in return; and independently of this, if my labour do no good, the comfort is, it can do little ill.

I reached what certain persons have been pleased to call "the intellectual city," on the afternoon of yesterday-week. The country of Tweedsmuir, you have often heard me say, is the most mournful in Europe. Rugged, without being elevated; barren, stormy, and covered, at least in winter, with an ever-brooding darkness, it seems a fit haunt for the harassed fanatics who tenanted it in the seventeenth century. I never crossed this dismal region without melancholy, bitter recollections of the good which I had left ; and forebodings of the evil I was likely to meet with : in short, if Trophonius should ever think of setting up in the world again, I would have him leave far behind the vales of Thessaly, however tempting they may seem, and dig his grotto in some *hope*¹ of this dark Cimmerian desert ! You may wonder why I so vehemently abuse this “excellent sheep country :” I cannot say—unless that on Tuesday the roads were very bad and the weather very wet ; and according to David Hume contiguity in time or place is a principle of association among our ideas.

¹ The once noted book of Professor John Millar of Glasgow, entitled An Historical View of the English Government, first published in 1787.

Since my arrival in Edinburgh, the employment of waiting for carriers, travelling to Fife, etc., has consumed most of my time. On Tuesday morning the benevolent Mr. Duncan carried me to Bailie Waugh’s. This worshipful magistrate seems (under the rose) to be a very flimsy vapouring sort of character. I left him my address ; and shall probably hear no more of him. With regard to your most kind Minister, my circumstances qualify me but poorly for doing any justice to the feelings which his conduct is calculated to excite. Even to you I cannot enter upon this subject. Yester-night I enrolled in the class of Scots law.¹ The Professor, Dr. Hume, a nephew of the philosopher already mentioned, speaks in a voice scarce audible; and his thinking has yet to show all its points of similarity with the penetrating genius of his Uncle. Yet I prophesy I shall not dislike the science. If health continue, I shall feel for it all the ardour which is naturally inspired by the prospect (however dubious) of its affording a permanent direction to my efforts: I shall require, moreover, to investigate the history, antiquities, manners, etc., of our native country—a subject for which I feel nothing like repugnance: and for the details of the subject—six years of solitary reading (would it had been study !) have given me a most courageous indifference to the magnitude of any folio capable of being lifted without the aid of the mechanical powers. My fear at the present is even that I shall not be able to procure a copy of Erskine's Institutes.¹ But next time I write you shall know more particularly about these affairs.

¹ Hope = a sloping hollow between two hills.

¹ “I had thought of attempting to become an advocate. It seemed glorious to me for its independency, and I did read some law books, attend Hume’s lectures on Scotch law, and converse with and question various dull people of the practical sort. But it and they and the admired lecturing Hume himself appeared to me mere denizens of the kingdom of dullness, pointing towards nothing but money as wages for all that bogpool of disgust. Hume’s lectures once done with, I flung the thing away for ever.”—Note of Carlyle’s cited by Froude in his Life of Carlyle, i. 64.

I have not seen Dr. Brewster, because he was not in town till this day. His journal² appears to be in a sickly state. Few speak of it ; and those few without respect.

There is little that I can tell you respecting the news civil or literary of these parts, which Mr. Duncan will not be much better qualified to lay before you. I heard Leslie once only. Desirous, it would appear, of beating Chalmers on his own ground, he is said to have been greatly distinguished this season for the piety of his opening lectures. When I was there, he spoke of many philosophers and their deeds from Hipparchus to Malus inclusive, in a pompous style—somewhat in Gibbon's vein—except that Gibbon is seldom tawdry. Wallace,¹ whom I went this day to see, is a person about fifty years old—short, bald-headed, with a grim and intelligent countenance. His manner is blunt ; he speaks with a Scotch accent ;—and if his unaffected and patient demeanour is accompanied with a display of philosophical reflection—which I cannot assert or deny—he ought surely to be a great favourite with the public. Leslie and he are said to be on the eve of battle,—for the Elements of Geometry and curves of the second order are to be discarded for Playfair's Euclid ! Love me, love my dog—the saw says : still more should it say, love me, love my book. Science you see, as well as religion, is at times disturbed by the feuds of its professors. What have we to say but wish these worthies a fair field and no favour ?

¹ Institutes of the Laws of Scotland, by John Erskine, Professor of Scottish Law in the University of Edinburgh, 1773.

² The Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, the publication of which had just begun.

*Non nostrum inter vos tantas componere lites :
Et vitula tu dignus, et hic.*

¹ Professor William Wallace, appointed in 1819 Professor of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh.

But I must quit these lucubrations—tell me very soon what progress you make in Crombie; give me an order to get you Lipsius, either of the Scaligers, Casaubon, or the never-dying Ernesti, and I shall obey you with immense cheerfulness. Seriously though, I think your study of classical literature likely to benefit you. It is not enough to pursue philosophy through all her intricate recesses: we must have a trade—since we have no fortune. And although we have quitted one profession, in which many lead a tranquil, and one or two a dignified life, it may be we shall both yet have our wishes gratified. Who knows indeed but you being Professor of Humanity, I a tired causidicus, may delight to interrupt your evenings of literary leisure—and call to mind the days of yore? Espérons, say I always; and in the meantime, I conclude this sheet—and its most hurried contents, with subscribing myself once more, your old and faithful friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Lipsius is here—I mean his Roma Antiqua.

You shall have it in summer—sooner if you like. Write immediately.

XLII.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, DUFF'S LODGINGS,
35 BRISTO STREET, 2d December 1819.

MY DEAR JACK—I am very much satisfied, as may well be supposed, to hear that thou and the cattle got safely home—though faint, yet persevering. I have only to hope that nothing sustained any serious injury by that adventure. Most probably you are already come home from Cumberland. I trust you and our cousin (to whom give my best love) were pleased with the beautiful, though at this season prostrate, aspect of that interesting county. You have no doubt resumed your occupations; and at this hour (six o'clock) I suppose are "forming the circle" around your cheerful fire, to teach, and to be taught. Innocent group! peace be with you all!

.

I have very little time to enter into particulars about my studies, which indeed are yet (alas!) hardly begun. I am at the Scots law class; and the professor (a nephew of the historian Hume) is most perspicuous; but law is to me an untrodden path, and much toil will be requisite for mastering it. Yet I fear that little. I have got four very ponderous quartos of notes taken from these lectures, in shorthand—they promise to be of much use to me. I have read Millar on the English government, etc. The notes came from Hill (my comrade for a part of last winter): perhaps I shall send these letters in the box, which once held these learned papers. But I must have done, Jack. Remember me in the most kind manner to Mag, Jemmy, Mary, Jean, and little Jenny. Tell all of them to write me that can write. Be good to them, poor things. Send me all your copies, write copiously (in your letter to me); and be assured that I remain, my dear Brother, yours most faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

I have not time to send the box—7 $\frac{3}{4}$ o'clock.

You will send down that great ugly Italian book Nani, Storia della Venezia, along with the note to Annan. Geordy is to send me a book of the Scots Acts of Parliament: you will put it in the box.

XLIII.—To his MOTHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, DUFF'S LODGINGS,
35 BRISTO STREET, 15th December 1819.

MY DEAR MOTHER—Nothing could give me greater pleasure than to learn that you continue in good health, and are improving even in that particular. I entreat you, for the sake of us all, to be careful of this invaluable privilege. It is the foundation of every earthly blessing. With it and a clear conscience, no human creature need in general be miserable. You will be satisfied to learn that I am very well. By taking a proper degree of exercise my bodily frame, I find, may be made to do its duty pretty well; and accordingly I make a point to divide the day between study and walking. It is the more necessary, as when I neglect it, the dark side of my affairs never fails to present itself to my solitary imagination, and I am as unfit for study as for flying. Upon the whole, however, I go courageously along ; and to beat the hoof half an hour before breakfast, and an hour before entering the law class at two or rather half-past one, is quite sufficient to keep me in good heart. The law I find to be a most complicated subject ; yet I like it pretty well, and feel that I shall like it better as I proceed. Its great charm in my eyes, is that no mean compliances are requisite for prospering in it. I must struggle, and solace myself with the delightful hope that the day will yet come when I may show you all what sense I entertain of your affectionate conduct.

The cakes are excellent and most acceptable. I think you must have left out one sock : at least I can find but three in the box. You need not take all this trouble on you, about these articles. I have plenty of socks. I know not whom to thank for the ham : doubtless it will do me good service. I have not yet fairly arranged the newspaper, not having looked for the carrier so soon. I shall tell you fully about it when he returns. Write to me very copiously, whenever you can find as much time. I trust, my dear Mother, we shall yet agree in all things. But absolute sameness of opinion, upon any point, is not, as I have often said, to be looked for in this low erring world. Excuse my brevity ; and believe me to be, my dear Mother, ever yours most affectionately,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

My compliments to Margaret: she must write before the milking hour another time. My father, I trust, is well, though you say nothing of him.

XLIV.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 15th December 1819.

MY DEAR ALICK— . . . You will be glad to learn that I am well and comfortable. . . . I attend the law class, with some satisfaction, and read a book called Erskine's Institutes upon the same. This Erskine's Institutes would weigh about four stones avoirdupois ; and you would think the very Goddess of dulness had inspired every sentence. Yet I proceed without fainting. I go likewise occasionally to the Parliament House, and hear the pleadings. I imagine it would not be difficult to demolish certain persons whom I see gain a livelihood by pleading there. In the meantime it behoves me to live in hope, and make every effort. There is nothing new here almost. Some timorous individuals about Glasgow imagined that the Radicals (as their cant name is) intended to rise on Monday last ; and accordingly on Saturday all the soldiers were sent from Edinburgh and Jock's Lodge ;¹ our volunteers took possession of the Castle ; and there was riding, running, marching, and counter-marching in every direction. I saw the yeomen set out on Sunday morning. This was very gallant ; and the five thousand soldiers that surrounded Glasgow were, I doubt not, very gallant fellows ; but the Radicals stuck to their looms. A mountain was once in labour, and when all men had come to see the issue—a mouse was born. So is it with the “rebellion in the west,” and the five and twenty thousand men in arms that were to murder all his Majesty’s lieges in Lanarkshire.¹ I am very vexed that you see

¹ Barracks in the neighbourhood.

¹ The misery of the Working Classes in England and Scotland at this period made a lasting impression on Carlyle. The condition and disposition of these people already began to seem to him, as he said twenty years later in his Chartism, “the most ominous of all practical matters whatever.” A passage from his Reminiscences (i. 152) fills out the narration in this letter. “Year 1819 comes back into my mind as the year of the Radical ‘rising’ in Glasgow; and the kind of (altogether imaginary) ‘fight’ they attempted on Bonnymuir against the Yeomanry which had assembled from far and wide. A time of great rages and absurd terrors and expectations, a very fierce Radical and Anti-Radical time. Edinburgh endlessly agitated all round me by it, not to mention Glasgow in the distance; gentry people full of zeal and foolish terror and fury, and looking disgustingly busy and important. Courier hussars would come in from the Glasgow region covered with mud, breathless, for headquarters, as you took your walk in Princes Street; and you would hear old powdered gentlemen in silver spectacles talking with low-toned but exultant voice about ‘cordon of troops, sir,’ as you went along. The mass of the people, not the populace alone, had a quite different feeling, as if the danger from those West-country Radicals was small or imaginary, and their grievances dreadfully real;—which was with emphasis my own poor private notion of it. One bleared Sunday morning, perhaps seven or eight A.M., I had gone out for my walk. At the Riding-House in Nicolson Street was a kind of straggly group, or small crowd, with redcoats inter-

no newspaper at this most interesting period. I must try to get a Scotsman some way ; for I see none myself, except when I go to the book-seller's shop, which is very unsatisfactory. You have not sent me any copy, yet I hope you continue to write, and also to mind your spelling. How does Hume go forward ? I expect a spersed. Coming up I perceived it was the 'Lothian Yeomanry' (Mid or East I know not), just getting under way for Glasgow to be part of 'the cordon.' I halted a moment. They took the road, very ill-ranked, not numerous or very dangerous-looking men of war ; but there rose from the little crowd, by way of farewell cheer to them, the strangest shout I have heard human throats utter ; not very loud, or loud even for the small numbers ; but it said as plain as words, and with infinitely more emphasis of sincerity, 'May the Devil go with you, ye peculiarly contemptible and dead to the distresses of your fellow-creatures !' Another morning, months after, spring and sun now come, and the 'cordon,' etc., all over, I met a gentleman, an advocate, slightly of my acquaintance, hurrying along, musket in hand, towards the Links, there to be drilled as an item of the 'gentlemen' volunteers now afoot. 'You should have the like of this,' said he, cheerily patting his musket. 'Hm, yes ; but I haven't yet quite settled on which side !'—which probably he hoped was quiz, though it really expressed my feeling. Irving too, and all of us juniors, had the same feeling in different intensities, and spoken only to one another : a sense that revolt against such a load of unveracities, impostures, and quietly inane formalities would one day become indispensable ;—sense which had a kind of rash, false, and quasi-insolent joy in it ; mutiny, revolt, being a light matter to the young."

long account of everything from you when you write next. I do not think of leaving Edinburgh during the vacation at Christmas. I shall stay and read or write rather. Believe me to be, my dear Brother, yours most faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

I forgot to send your money last time. I shall (unless this hurry mislead me) send you four notes this journey. I believe the debt is somewhat less, but I owe Jack something ; and the remainder you can give my Mother for shirts, etc., retaining a few shillings to buy me tobacco from time to time. Keep it very wet—the tobacco I mean.

XLV.—TO ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 29th December 1819.

MY DEAR BROTHER— . . . I said I should stay in Edinburgh during the Christmas holidays ; but happily my firmness in this determination was not put to the test. Our professor gives no holidays ; so, at the present festive season, we are labouring with our wonted assiduity in the complex study of Law. I have not yet gained much knowledge of it: but he (Mr. Hume) is very plain hitherto, and by the help of those monstrous tomes with which I am environed, there is little doubt that I may in time acquire competent information upon all the branches of this science. I have not been so diligent of late, on account of a paper I am writing—which I have a design to offer for publication. No mortal is aware of it, so you need not mention the circumstance: but I can see well enough that to this point my chief efforts should be directed. In fact, unless my pen will afford me present subsistence, what hope have I in Law? I ought to try at least,—and I shall tell you the issue of my trial when it happens. Yet if these schemes should fail I need not still despair. Teaching and preaching are the only trades that I have forsworn; and it will be hard, very hard, if a humble man cannot earn his bit of bread in any other department of art or science. I will not despair nor even despond.

In the meantime it is pleasant to have these few hard-earned notes by me, to answer every exigency. Economy and diligence will go far in all cases. . . . I remain, my dear Brother, yours most faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XLVI.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 26th January 1820.

MY DEAR BROTHER—I was very happy to learn by the carrier's arrival, some hours ago, that you were all in a state of health and motion at the period of his departure. You will be satisfied, in your turn, to hear that I am still afoot, notwithstanding the late tremendous reign of frost, which seemed enough to destroy every symptom of animal or vegetable life. Of all the kinds of weather that in my lifetime have descended from the pitiless North, the tract which is just ended appears to have been the most appalling. What with ice and snow and biting breezes, Edinburgh seemed to be the capital of Greenland rather than of Caledonia. But the thaw has come at last, and I have gone through the process of freezing without any inconvenience, except a filthy snivelling cold, which I picked up last Saturday, and which I expect to lay down to-morrow or next day. It may last a week if it will, for it gives me very small inconvenience.

Your long letter gratified me not a little. You are by far too severe a critic of your own productions. The account of your journey to Cumberland was replete with amusing notices. I can perfectly conceive the feelings excited by your situation at Workington, upon being refused admittance at Curwen's Arms. It is at such a time that the dogged stubborn sentiment of obdured patience (too nearly allied to ill-nature, in some other cases) is really valuable. One has often room to use it in the business of life. You have now partly seen Cumberland; and though at a time of disadvantage, your journey will not be altogether fruitless: the remembrance of Skiddaw and the wild mountains that have frowned, since the creation's dawn, beside him, is a pleasing subject for the mind to rest on; and even the sight of the rude but honest-hearted boors that inhabit those regions, and the comparison of their ways of thinking and acting with our own, is always attended with enjoyment, and might be with advantage.

I am truly glad to find that you persevere in Hume. The remarks you make upon the various characters of whom he treats seem just, as far as I can remember. Nor can I blame your enthusiasm at the name of Wallace or him of Bannockburn. Those heroes stood in the breach when their country was in peril; that Scotland is not as Ireland¹ is perhaps owing in a great measure to their exertions. As you proceed in the narrative, the events will become more interesting; and you will have more occasion to be on your guard against Mr. Hume's propensities to Toryism. Next time you write

¹ This thought remained with Carlyle. In Past and Present, published in 1843, he wrote (p. 16): "A heroic Wallace, quartered on the scaffold, cannot hinder that his Scotland become, one day, a part of England: but he does hinder that it become, on tyrannous unfair terms, a part of it. . . . If the union with England be in fact one of Scotland's chief blessings, we thank Wallace withal that it was not the chief curse. Scotland is not Ireland: no, because brave men rose there, and said, 'Behold, ye must not tread us down like slaves; and ye shall not,—and cannot!'"

I shall expect to hear about Surrey and Wolsey, Elizabeth, Raleigh, Drake, etc. Before concluding, I will again take the liberty to advise you to be very careful of your writing. Your spelling is materially improved : a little further care will make it quite perfect.

Your fears about my health are very obliging ; though quite unnecessary at the present. In fact I am generally in very fair health : and I do not study at all too severely—indeed not diligently enough, I fear. For some time back I have been employed a part of each night in writing a paper for the Edinburgh Review. I at last gave it in last Monday—in a letter to Francis Jeffrey, Esq., desiring him to send it back if it did not suit the purpose. I have yet got no answer. Indeed, I should not be surprised if it were not accepted :¹ it was written on a very dry subject; and I was not at the time in my happiest mood for writing well. But if (as is very likely) it be returned upon

¹ A fuller account of this attempt is given in the Reminiscences (ii. 17). “It was still some eight or ten years before any personal contact occurred between Jeffrey and me ; nor did I ever tell him what a bitter passage, known to only one party, there had been between us. It was probably in 1819 or 1820 (the coldest winter I ever knew) that I had taken a most private resolution and executed it in spite of physical and other misery, to try Jeffrey with an actual contribution to the Edinburgh

Review. The idea seemed great and might be tried, though nearly desperate. I had got hold somewhere (for even books were all but inaccessible to me) of a foolish enough, but new French book, a mechanical Theory of Gravitation elaborately worked out by a late foolish M. Pictet (I think that was the name) in Geneva. This I carefully read, judged of, and elaborately dictated a candid account and condemnation of, or modestly firm contradiction of (my amanuensis, a certain feeble but enquiring quasi-disciple of mine, called George Dalglish of Annan, from whom I kept my ulterior purpose quite secret). Well do I yet remember those dreary evenings in Bristo Street; oh, what ghastly passages and dismal successive spasms of attempt at 'Literary Enterprise'—Herclii Selenographia, with poor Horrox's Venus in Sole visa, intended for some ghastly Life of the said Horrox,—this for one other instance! I read all Saussure's four quartos of Travels in Switzerland too (and still remember much of it) I know not with what object. I was banished, solitary, as if to the bottom of a cave, and blindly had to try many impossible roads out! My review of Pictet all fairly written out in George Dalglish's good clerk hand, I penned some brief polite note to the great Editor, and walked off with the small parcel one night to his address in George Street. I very well remember leaving it with his valet there, and disappearing in the night with various thoughts and doubts! My hopes had never risen high, or in fact risen at all; but for a fortnight or so they did not quite die out, and then it was absolute zero; no answer, no return of MS., absolutely no notice taken, which was a form of catastrophe more complete than even I had anticipated! There rose in my head a pungent little note which might be written to the great man, me, I shall not take it greatly to heart. We can try again upon a more promising theme. No mortal but you knows of it ; so I shall not feel abashed at the failure of an attempt which was honest in its nature, and will be unknown in its consequences—to any except friends. I shall tell you the result next letter. You do well to read the Scotsman. You will find in it a considerable quantity of information, and by combining it with the Courier (of the Manchester paper I know little), you will be able to with neatly cutting considerations offered him from the small unknown ditto ; but I wisely judged it was still more dignified to let the matter lie as it was, and take what I had got for my own benefit only. Nor did I ever mention it to almost anybody, least of all to Jeffrey in subsequent changed times, when at any rate it was fallen extinct. It was my second, not quite my first attempt in that fashion. Above two years before, from Kirkcaldy, I had forwarded to some magazine editor in Edinburgh what, perhaps, was a likelier little article (of descriptive tourist kind after a real tour by Yarrow country into Annandale) which also vanished without sign ; not much to my regret that first one, nor indeed very much the second either (a dull affair altogether, I could not but admit), and no third adventure of the kind lay ahead for me. It must be owned my first entrances into glorious ‘Literature’ were abundantly stinted and pitiful ; but a man does enter if, even with a small gift, he persist ; and perhaps it is no disadvantage if the door be several times slammed in his face, as a preliminary.”

form some idea of the state of the country, which at this time has an aspect particularly striking. In case I should forget to do it elsewhere, I must beg you to tell the Sutor that I cannot get the Scotsman till he send me an order in writing to that effect. I may have it next journey.—Believe me to be your affectionate Brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

XLVII.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 26th January 1820.

MY DEAR JACK—I have read over your letter with great satisfaction ; and I devote the short while, which yet remains before Geordie's departure, to scribble this half-sheet by way of reply to it. I ought in the first place to ask your pardon for misdirecting you about the Latin book you were to read. The volume in question is not, I find, at Mainhill, but here : I shall send it down in the box, and if you can manage it—well ; if not, send me word, and I shall not fail to get you another edition of it, with notes and a glossary, which you will find quite intelligible.

You do well to proceed with the Latin: it can in no case be quite useless to you; it may eventually be of great service. The understanding of one's own Tongue is at all times an important matter; and no way is so completely efficient for that purpose as the study of Latin, which it is mainly grounded on and derived from. But particularly attend to your penmanship; neglect no night to write a copy—longer or shorter. I approved very much of your remarks upon David Hume. Sandy tells me that you and he are in the habit of attending chiefly to the manners, opinions and general features of the different periods which you read about. This is the true way of proceeding in the study of history. It is good, surely, because it is pleasing, to know about battles and sieges and such matters—and these things ought carefully to be stored up in the mind; but a person who gathers nothing more from the annals of a nation is not much wiser than one who should treasure up the straw of a threshing-floor and leave the grain behind. You are right to attend to dates; do not neglect the geography of the countries. In a short while you will find some of your old friends whom you met with in Charles V. I am very glad that Alick and you are going fairly to get through Hume: it is a task which very few accomplish, notwithstanding its pleasantness and utility. No one without it can be said to understand the first principles of the laws, church government or manners of his own country. . . .

There is nothing new here; at least nothing that penetrates my secluded abode. The common people are in great distress; though for several reasons that distress is less severely felt here than in manufacturing districts. The substantial burghers and other idle loyalists of the place are training themselves to the use of arms for the purpose of suppressing the imaginary revolts of the lower orders. When I meet one of those heroic personages, with his buff-belts, his cartouche-box and weapons of war, obstructing the progress of his Majesty's subjects along the streets, I can scarce suppress a bitter smile at the selfishness and stupidity of men. In fact "steel pills," though a very natural, are a very ineffectual remedy for a decayed "constitution." . . .

You must write at great length next time : send me all the news in any degree or even no degree interesting. Mind your reading, that is, an account of it for my inspection.— I am, my dear Brother, yours affectionately, THOS. CARLYLE.

XLVIII.—To his MOTHER.

EDINBURGH, 26th January 1820.

MY DEAR MOTHER—Though you have not favoured me with a line this great while, yet, as I have still a few minutes left, I take the opportunity thus afforded me of sending you some small account of my proceedings.

You will doubtless think me a very trustless person for taking no farther notice of the Philanthropic Gazette, which I promised to get for you. The truth is, the poor drivelling bookseller, about whom I spoke, hampered and hummed so piteously last time I broached the subject, that I took compassion on his indecision and left the subject at rest. I am very sorry that you should be disappointed in this matter; but after all, I do not think very highly of the gazette in question, and the Repository seems to be a better book in several respects. If you want any publication that I can procure, do not fail to tell me, and it shall be forthcoming. Anything that I can ever do to serve you must lie far behind what I have owed to you since the earliest days of my existence.

The cakes you sent came in good season, their predecessors having been concluded two or three days ago. I was also glad to see the butter; for the first excellent pot came to an end soon after Farries' last visit to this city. The stuff which they sell here under the name of butter has few titles, often, to that honourable epithet. The main ingredient is sea-salt; the rest a yellow sour-tasted substance, which, whether it ever actually existed in the shape of milk, I cannot determine. I am likewise obliged by the pieces of meat : but though I have sent home the meal-poke, its contents are not exhausted—a portion of them yet remains, in some jar or other, for future consumption.

Having now discussed these small matters, I must proceed to make some inquiries about your actual situation. And first of health. I entreat you, my dear Mother, to be careful of that greatest of blessings. Do not expose yourself on any account in this intemperate weather : you are not calculated to stand it. Indeed its effects are pernicious to any one ; but much more to one in your situation. When you write, I expect to hear very minutely about every thing pertaining to you. Do you ever recollect our evening-meals in the little room, during the last, to me unusual but not unhappy summer ?

I have already told the *callants*¹ that I am in a good state of health ; therefore I need not enlarge upon this point. My way of life is very simple. I see few acquaintances ; those I might see are not without good qualities, but their conversation cannot benefit me greatly : so I devote my time to reading—all but two or three different portions of it which are daily spent in walking. Whether I shall succeed in this undertaking of law, must depend on several circumstances. Providence, as you have often told me, will regulate them. Meanwhile let no malignant person put you in fear about my future destiny. With health, which I hope to enjoy, and with a frugal disposition, which I am pretty sure of enjoying, there is no room to fear. You must write to me whenever you can find time. Remember me to my Father and all the rest about home.—I remain, my dear Mother, yours most affectionately, THOS. CARLYLE.

¹ Boys.

XLIX.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 1st March 1820.

MY DEAR BROTHER—One of the first objects which saluted my eyes this morning, on sallying forth to take the usual walk, was the welcome figure of George Farries. But though this diligent wayfaring man promised to send my box to me without loss of time ; and though I did actually get it, on personal applications being repeated, about eleven o'clock ; yet so many small engagements have intervened, that twilight has arrived before I am able to commence my reply to your letter. . . .

I have not been altogether idle, though my efforts have been directed to trifling objects. The Life of Montesquieu¹ was delivered to Brewster Saturday gone-a-week ; and one of the small engagements alluded to above, was the concluding of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's Life, which little George Dalglish finished copying for me, about an hour ago. The two will occupy some five or six pages. I am also to write the Life of Dr. Moore, his son Sir John Moore, Nelson, etc. etc. I do not get on very quickly in these operations ; but this is like my apprenticeship as it were ; in time I shall do it far more readily. So soon as I can seize upon anything fit to be employed with—a book to translate or the like, which I am not altogether without hopes of doing—I shall hie to Annandale, to inhale my native breezes once again. Last summer's residence there did me a world of good: another summer so spent would entirely new-model me. If I come, I shall not fail to make proof of that shallow-made, high-standing quadruped which you have purchased: its price and your description lead me to expect a beast far preferable to poor Duncan.

¹ Job-work for the Edinburgh Encyclopædia.

As you read the Scotsman and Courier newspapers, intelligence of that plot¹ at London cannot but have reached you. It is a horrid piece of business—assassination has long been a stranger to the British soil: but whilst we deprecate such shocking attempts, some pity should be mingled with our abhorrence of the frantic conspirators. Well-founded complaints of poverty, one might almost say starvation, met with indifference or cold-blooded ridicule on the part of Governments, very naturally exasperate the ignorant minds of the governed, and impel them to enterprises of a desperate nature. If the King and his ministers do not adopt a set of measures entirely different from those which they have followed hitherto, it is greatly to be dreaded that more formidable and better concerted resistance will ensue—or what is worse, that Britain, once the mistress of the ocean, and the renowned seat of arms and arts, will sink from her lofty elevation, her rude cliffs, no longer embellished by freedom, presenting only their native barrenness and insignificance. But I hope better of Old England yet. In the meantime, what constitutes our wisest plan is to follow our private concerns as diligently as we may, without mingling in evil broils—unless imperious necessity call us so to do.

¹ The famous Cato Street Conspiracy,—a plot for the assassination of the Ministers on the 23d of February, which, for a while, “absorbed every other topic of public interest.”

You are very just in supposing that the offer (poor indeed but the best the circumstances will permit) which I made you was quite serious and unfeigned. I know not whether any channel opens in which you might try your commercial skill; but if it do, I would certainly advise you to embrace the opportunity—though it were but to instruct you with regard to what, I suppose, will be your future occupation. Command me, my boy, so far as the few pounds I have are able to extend: they will increase yet, I ween, by diligence and activity. I cannot employ them better. But lo! the end of my paper. Excuse my dulness—believe that I shall do better another time; and do not doubt that, I remain (my dear Brother) ever yours most affectionately,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

L.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

EDINBURGH, 18th March 1820.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—Ever since the month of January last, a train of ill-health, with its usual depression, aggravated by other privations and calamities too tedious to particularise, has pressed heavily upon me. The victim of inquietude and despondency, I could not resolve to afflict you with my sorrows or my dulness; and though conscience frequently accused me of neglect, three months, you see, have passed away before the simple duty of answering your letter is performed. Though the period of my silence has been long, the excuse which I have offered might apply still longer ; but my friends are too few, and my opportunities of acquiring more too slender for allowing me to stand such hazards : I cannot afford to lose the pleasure of our intimacy, and lest desuetude may cool (I trust it will not extinguish) that feeling, I write although it be "in spite of nature and my stars."

You would suspect me of a closeness, far enough from my disposition, if I did not attempt to trace you a sketch of the life which I have led for some time past. It must be a brief sketch for many reasons, however ; and chiefly because it will contain no feature calculated to interest any one, even a second self. Zimmermann has written a book which he calls The Pleasures of Solitude ; I would not have you to believe him : solitude in truth has few pleasures, uninterrupted solitude is full of pain. But solitude, or company more distressing, is not the worst ingredient of this condition. The thought that one's best days are hurrying darkly and uselessly away is yet more grievous. It is vain to deny it, my friend, I am altogether an unprofitable creature. Timid, yet not humble, weak, yet enthusiastic; nature and education have rendered me entirely unfit to force my way among the thick-skinned inhabitants of this planet. Law, I fear, must be renounced; it is a shapeless mass of absurdity and chicane, and the ten years, which a barrister commonly spends in painful idleness, before arriving at employment, is more than my physical or moral frame could endure. Teaching a school is but another word for sure and not very slow destruction: and as to compiling the wretched lives of Montesquieu, Montagu, Montaigne, etc., for Dr. Brewster—the remuneration will hardly sustain life. What then is to be done? This situation—but I touch a string which generally yields a tedious sound to any but the operator. I know you are not indifferent to the matter, but I would not tire you with it. The fate of one man is a mighty small concern in the grand whole of this best of all possible worlds ; let us quit the subject, with just one observation more, which I throw out for your benefit should you ever come to need such an advice. It is to keep the profession you have adopted, if it be at all tolerable. A young man who goes forth into the world to seek his fortune with those lofty ideas of honour and uprightness which a studious secluded life naturally begets, will in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred, if friends and other aids are wanting, fall into the sere, the yellow leaf, and if he quit not his integrity, end a wretched though happily a short career in misery and failure. Dissipation is infinitely worse : I thank Heaven I am not a poet, I shall avoid that sad alternative.

I was glad to learn that you had finished the perusal of Homer. Certainly the blind bard is little obliged by your opinion of him : I believe, however, Candour is, and that is better. If from the admiration felt by Casaubon, Scaliger and Co., and still more by the crowds that blindly follow them, we could subtract that portion which originated in the as hollow admiration of others for the same object ; and if, further, all affectation could be banished ; I fear a very inconsiderable item would remain. In fact Mæonides has had his day—at least the better part of it ; the noon was five and twenty centuries ago ; the twilight (for he set in 1453) may last for another five and twenty centuries—but it too must terminate. Nothing that we know of can last for ever. The very mountains are silently wasting away, and long before eternity is done, Mont Blanc might cease to be the pinnacle of Europe, and Chimborazo lie under the Pacific. Philosophy and literature have a far shorter date. Error, in the first, succeeds to error, as wave to wave. Plato obscured the fame of Pythagoras, Cudworth and Kant of Plato : the Stagirite and his idle spawn have been swept away by Lord Bacon, himself to be swept away in his turn. Even in the narrow dominion of truth the continuance of renown is not more durable : each succeeding observer from a higher vantage-ground compresses the labours of his forerunner ; and as the Principia of Newton is already swallowed up in the Mécanique Céleste of La Place, so likewise will it fare with this present Lord of the ascendant. Poetry, they tell us, escapes the general doom: but even without the aid of revolutions or deluges, it cannot always escape. The ideas about which it is conversant must differ in every different age and country. The Poetry of a Choctaw, I imagine, would turn chiefly on the pains of hunger, and the pleasures of catching Bears or scalping Chicasaws. In like manner, though some of the affections which Homer delineates are co-existent with the race, yet in the progress of refinement (or change) his mode of delineating them will appear trivial or disgusting—and the very twilight of his fame will have an end. Thus all things are dying, my friend,—only ourselves die faster. Man! if I had £200 a year, a beautiful little house in some laughing valley, three or four pure-spirited mortals who would love me and be loved again, together with a handsome library, and—a great genius, I would investigate the hallucinations that connect themselves with such ideas. At present I must revisit this nether sphere.

I know not whether I shall see you in summer ; most probably I shall leave this town —if for ever I need not greatly care : but whether or not, I need not add that I remain, my dear Mitchell, yours ever,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LI.—TO ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 29th March 1820.

Many thanks, my dear Alick, for your agreeable and entertaining Letter. . . .

You and my other affectionate friends at Mainhill are very kind to press me so urgently to come home. I shall not forget this speedily. The word home is sweet to a Scottish ear : and I should be the most unthankful soul on earth, if I did not gratefully reflect, that among all my wants and disappointments, I have yet Parents and brethren left with whom I can repose for a season, and forget, in the midst of sincere affection, liberty, and vernal breezes, the smoke and stir of this dull world. Of late I have often been meditating to come home; last summer was of very great importance to me, and had I some stated job of work to keep me in employment and drive away "the vultures of the mind," I could spend the approaching months among you with great advantage. I was happy at Mainhill, happier upon the whole than I have been in general since my boyhood; and though we, degenerate posterity of Adam as we are, have in our hearts a fund of aloes that would chequer even the felicity of Eden, I hope to be happy there again. Before writing, I expected to have it in my power to give you some satisfactory account of the chance I have to get a translation or other business of the like stamp to manage in my rustication; and when the box arrived, I was busy writing the lives of Sir J. Moore and his father Dr. Moore, in order that upon presenting them to Brewster tomorrow, I might make some inquiries as to this matter. What my success may be I shall be better able to tell you next opportunity. In the meantime I have some hope. I anticipate pleasure if I succeed ;—rising early, evening cracks, Duncan's worthier representative (I mean the steed Duncan), and many things more, arise before the fancy : but if I should fail, as much doubt there is,—seeing “the best concerted schemes of mice and men gang aft aglee,” I shall not altogether droop. With health, I can turn me many ways ; and I hope completely to recover that blessing. Dr. Brewster tells me that for fifteen years he was at death's door ; and now in his forty-second year he is perfectly well.—After these lives above referred to, I have none to write, but those of Necker and Admiral Nelson, which will not be needed for six months. A review for Brewster's Philosophical Journal of a German book on Magnetism, I must also write or say I cannot ; the former alternative is better : and then (as our man of law concludes in a few days) I am my own master, to go whithersoever I list. I shall make a violent effort to accomplish all these things :—and come home with a French or Latin book under my arm. Home any way.

I expect earnestly to see what are your opinions regarding Hume. Poor Carruthers! The strong and the weak alike wither at the touch of fate.—Write to me at large, and believe me to be, my dear Brother, yours most faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LII.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 19th April 1820.

MY DEAR ALICK—I received your letter about noon; and being this day upon the fasting list (not from religious but medicinal motives), I have spirits to write but very imperfectly to you and not at all to my valuable correspondent Jack, whose letter, however, I esteem very highly on many accounts. In truth my silence is of small importance any way: I am coming home soon, and if once I “loose my tinkler jaw” among you, you shall get enough and to spare of it. This flitting plan is a most soul-tearing thing at best; and besides the unavoidable labour of packing goods and clearing scores, I have to strive with multiplied engagements relating to my summer's employment. When I wrote last, I knew not whether I should get any business at all to keep my hands in use ; but it now appears that I am to write several Articles for the Encyclopædia (what they are I do not know—for I have just been putting down a pretty long list, which Dr. B. is to examine and select from and report about on Friday morning); I have also two pretty long articles to translate which is the easiest job ; and lastly (which ought to have been first) I have to write a kind of review of that clear-backed large book which you will see in the box—upon Magnetism and other points : I ought to have done it here you know ; but I felt my poor head so embarrassed and confused with one thing and another that it seemed upon the whole an easier plan to take the concern home with me, and prepare it at my ease—what ease at least I can find before the middle of May, when it will be needed. I have likewise some (slender) hopes of getting a French book to translate, Life of Madame de Staël ; but of this I am far from certain, having only

Dr. Brewster for my henchman on this occasion, and he having no personal interest in the affair. But whether his application, which he was to make this day to one Tait a bookseller, be successful or not, I shall have plenty to do for one half-year : and though the money resulting from such labour is not at all abundant, it is considerably better than the rewards of laziness. It will serve at least to keep the Evil One out of one's pocket.

Now you will naturally be rather impatient after all this preamble, to know when I am actually to be at Mainhill. In brief then, my project is this. I have promised to go and see Irving at Glasgow before my return ; I design to leave this smoky and most dusty town on Saturday next ; the same night and next day I shall likely spend with Nicol at Airdrie, and on Monday I shall be with Ned. How long I shall stay there is not so certain : it will depend upon the state of the city, of Irving's engagements, etc. Upon the whole, however, it seems likely that if all go well I shall see you about Saturday (29th), or very soon after. It may be before : but you are not to weary if it should be Tuesday or Wednesday, though I think that unlikely. I trust I shall find you all in good trim. . . . Yours most faithfully,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

The Radicals are quiet. How many lies have been told about them! Poor wretches! they are to be pitied as well as condemned. Cobbler Smith is in Edinburgh Castle.

LIII.—To Mr. JAMES JOHNSTONE, Annapolis, Nova Scotia.

MAINHILL, 5th May 1820.

MY DEAR JOHNSTONE—It is vain to apologise or dissemble. I am one of the most careless, negligent, ungrateful dogs in existence. I ought without doubt to have answered your long-looked-for and most valuable letter by the very first opportunity. To have intended it, and gone directly to the Post-office for information about the Nova Scotia mails, is nothing : this long silence, the longest that has occurred in our correspondence, since we first had the happiness to know each other, gives you just ground to suspect that the lapse of a few months can obliterate all the traces of a long friendship from my mind, and render the duties of that honourable relation an empty name. I confess you have just grounds for such thoughts: and I despair of gaining credit when I assure you that in entertaining them you would do me anything but justice. Yet the fact is, I have not at any time forgotten you. Strolling about these moors last summer, the sight of Bogside,¹ of the sun setting in the West, and twenty other objects, incessantly and painfully recalled you to my memory: and in Edinburgh the presence of silly students with whom I could have no sympathy or fellowship recalled you still more painfully. Why then did I not write? I know not; I have said that there is no apology of a satisfactory kind, and I shall not attempt to offer you a frivolous one: but something like a palliation for my conduct may be found in the successive fits of activity and low spirits which occupied my time last winter, in the paucity of our opportunities to send letters to America, above all in the desultory procrastinating habits which a fluctuating being like me is sure to contract, and which steal away our minutes, we know not how, till they amount to months or years of time gone uselessly and irrecoverably by. It seemed so easy when I had missed the January mail (a few days after your letter reached me) to be in readiness against the first Wednesday of February; and when February and March had both passed fruitlessly away the thing became so painful to think upon, and Hill's projected voyage to New Brunswick offered such a flattering unction to my soul, that at last I gladly resolved to postpone the operation till his departure, which has been delayed several weeks longer than was expected. I ought to say also that I tried twice to write to you: but the demons of dulness and disquietude shed their poppies and their gall upon me; twice I attempted, and bis patriæ cecidere manus. Upon the whole, I see well enough that I have made out but a very lame case for myself; therefore after all that I can say my only resource is to throw myself on the mercy of the judge, and to entreat him to hope that I shall never in future behave so badly. If bulk can supply other deficiencies you shall be satisfied; for I design to scribble nearly all the paper in the house.

¹ Johnstone's home, near Mainhill.

I was going to congratulate you on the safe termination of the voyage described so vividly by your letter, and to express my hope that time had already moulded your way of thinking and living into some degree of toleration for that of Annapolis; when I learned that your new situation appeared likely to yield nothing but discomfort and chagrin; that your boys are stupid, your society brutish, your climate disagreeable, and everything about the place repulsive and disheartening. Alas! my dear friend, I am grieved to the heart for it. That by crossing the ocean you have not escaped from care, is not surprising—she climbs the deck along with us; she follows us to the throne and the temple; the grave alone is delivered from her visits : but that after so much exertion, danger, and vexation you should still find so little to sweeten the cup of life is an affliction that I did not anticipate. Yet what can I say to comfort you? My words cannot transform Acadia into Tempe, its rude Planters into Roscoes, or its Trulliber into what a clergyman ought to be. Nor am I at all prepared, even if I were qualified, to advise you at such a juncture—the circumstances have found me at second-hand ; I have been but two days at Mainhill, and I have yet seen none of your letters or correspondents. At first view, however, it certainly strikes me that America has presented its worst side to you. A new situation commonly resembles a new suit of clothes : rarely does it fail to gall the wearer in some points at the beginning ; yet a little while is generally sufficient to put all to rights, to make the robe accommodate itself to the man or the man to the robe. So may it fare with your tutorship at Annapolis. I can easily conceive, for I have often felt, the forlorn sensation that takes possession of the mind when no object is at hand to interest it, and no other mind to communicate with : I can understand the painfulness of teaching, the trouble of interrupted habits, and twenty other inconveniences that your place abounds with : yet still before determining (as I hear you have well-nigh done) to revisit Europe, I would have you steadily reflect upon the consequence of such a step. Can you determine to become a schoolmaster finally, to perambulate the country as a dissenting preacher, or to spend some dozen painful years in the family of a paltry squire with the hope of gaining an obscure footing in the Establishment.¹ None of these plans I think would suit you well ; yet they are almost the only avenues which the literary profession holds out for preferment to persons in our station. Even these poor avenues are in this country overcrowded ; one is jostled in them at every step : other lines of life are not less overcrowded ; and in place of times mending, it seems clear to most unprejudiced people that the distress, not to say starvation which at present involves the trading part of the community, must ultimately, and that ere long, involve all the lower classes entirely. Nothing then to be hoped but the dubious and distant result of revolution and civil discord. This is a pale and dreary prospect, my friend, which Great Britain holds out to one ; I fear, however, it is too faithful. On the other hand, consider how many of the evils that now torment you, custom will inure you to endure with indifference, perhaps with satisfaction—consider the pleasure of an independent maintenance—consider the boundless field which the new country opens for exertion of every sort—a field not impoverished like ours and disputed in daily strife ; but thinly occupied and fertile though coarse. Consider all this, I entreat you, before adopting a resolution which must now be final. Fortune and the world conspire to chastise us severely for inconstancy ; and at our time of life it is highly disadvantageous to change.

¹ The Established Kirk.

In all this long discussion, I have endeavoured to speak the cold and naked truth, as it appears to my own mind, on considering every circumstance that has come to my knowledge on the subject. I have endeavoured to divest myself of every partial or selfish feeling ; because I consider that your demeanour on this occasion may give a colour to the rest of your life ; and whoever takes upon him to advise a friend ought to speak with an eye to that friend's interest alone. It has cost me an effort so to do in this case : few persons, I suppose, have missed you more than I ; and though you, upon maturely contemplating both sides of the question, determine to return to Scotland, I shall be the very first to welcome you with heart and hand to your native shore. Perhaps you have views, which I know not of ; perhaps your agricultural skill might be exercised in England more advantageously than any of your other acquirements ; I shall be most happy to find it so : but I would not advise you to lay any stress upon the pleasure of spending another winter in Edinburgh ; unless you have distinct prospects of putting the knowledge you will acquire there to use, I would not advise you to go thither even though you were in Scotland and doing nothing. Edinburgh looks beautiful in the imagination, because the heart, when we knew it of old, was as yet unwrung and ready to derive enjoyment from whatever came before it. Visit the Alma Mater now, and you are disgusted, probably, with the most feeble drivelling of the students—shocked at the unphilosophic spirit of the professors—dissatisfied with the smoke and the odour and everything else in or about the city. I certainly would not counsel you to make any sacrifices, for what I know from sad experience would almost without doubt disappoint you: yet this, I think, ought hardly to weigh at all in forming your determination. Edinburgh may have changed since we knew it—we ourselves may have changed still more—yet after all, there is a world even in Scotland, there is a world elsewhere. I repeat my request (and with it conclude this prolix dissertation) that you would steadfastly and seriously consider the circumstances of the case—do nothing rashly—and if you resolve to return back to Annandale, be sure all your friends, and they are not few, will experience the greatest satisfaction at beholding you once more.

After perusing the preceding pages, gratuitously consecrated to advice upon a subject which I know so imperfectly, you will be ready to infer that myself am placed on some commanding eminence, above the vicissitudes of Fortune, and qualified to cast down an experienced eye upon the vortex of human affairs. You were never in your life more mistaken. At no period, that I recollect, have matters had a more doubtful aspect. I went to Edinburgh in winter, after a summer pleasantly but not very profitably spent at my Father's, with the view of studying Scots Law—intending, as you know, if all things prospered to make one desperate effort at obtaining an Advocate's gown; and gaining my bread by a profession recommended to my fancy so strongly by the honourable nature of the exertions that ensure success in it. I went in moderate health, and with considerable hopes: but alas! David Hume owns no spark of his uncle's genius; his lectures on law are (still excepting Erskine's Institutes)

the dullest piece of stuff I ever saw or heard of. Long-winded, dry details about points not of the slightest importance to any but an Attorney or Notary Public ; observations upon the formalities of customs which ought to be instantly and for ever abolished ; uncounted cases of blockhead A versus blockhead B, with what Stair thought upon them, what Bankton, what the poor doubting Dirleton ; and then the nature of actions of—— O infandum ! By degrees I got disheartened ; the science of law seemed little calculated to yield a reward proportionate to the labour of acquiring it ; I became remiss in my efforts to follow our Lecturer through the vast and thorny desert he was traversing ; till at length I abandoned him altogether—with a resolution that if ever I became familiar with law, it must be under different guidance. Occasionally too I tried writing, but most of my projects in that department altogether failed. The silly Lives of Montesquieu, Montaigne, etc. etc., which I wrote for Brewster's Encyclopædia are not worth mentioning ; the rest are yet in embryo. At length these incidents, aided powerfully by the last horrible winter, began to act upon my health: I determined to quit Edinburgh; and on Wednesday evening I returned once more to Mainhill—wearied and faint, and though long used, not altogether reconciled to the rest which is enjoyed upon the pillow of uncertainty. I am to translate and write some trifles during Summer if my spirits serve; what next—— I am sorry that I care so much more than I know. Upon the whole I am altering very fast. Hope will not always stay with one; and despair is not an eligible neighbour. I do not think I am ever to have any settled way of doing. Teaching and Preaching I have forsworn; and I believe I am too old for beginning any new profession. One leads a strange miscellaneous life at that rate: yet if it cannot be helped——

It must be owned, however, that I have no great reason to complain. On looking at the condition of many others there seems rather cause for gratulation. Never in the history of Britain did I read of such a situation. Black inquietude, misery physical and moral, from one end of the island to the other, Radical risings, and armed confederations of the higher classes, and little or no expectation of better times. This neighbourhood, I find, is suffering very slightly in comparison; on my way from Paisley I passed several groups journeying hither in search of work and food, like the Israelites of old to Goshen in the dearth: yet none can doubt that the Agriculture [sic] must feel the pressure of those taxes which at present exclude our commerce—except at a ruinous rate—from almost all the markets in the world. I am not a croaker; but I forecast nothing except an increase of calamity for several years to come. I suppose you have heard fully from the Newspapers of the Radical commotions, the marching, countermarching, and battles that have marked this troubled winter. The disturbances are quelled for a season; but as an old peasant, whom I overtook on the road from Muirkirk, expressed himself, unless these times alter, folks will all be Radicals together. One of the events which have occurred in the late troubles may affect you more than many other events of greater importance. I allude to the capture of William Smith, shoemaker, Ecclefechan, who had travelled to Glasgow for the purpose of buying leather; and falling in with sundry men of kindred sentiments, had further invested himself with the character of delegate from our poor unpolitical village, and proceeded to act forthwith in that capacity. His dignity soon withered from his brow; and scarcely had he got his sentiments disclosed, when the room in the Gallowgate which those statesmen occupied was environed by a party of soldiers, and the whole fraternity of reformers, with poor Will among them, were lodged in Glasgow jail. Poor Sutor! I know not the extent of his criminality: but from the complexion of the times, I should not be at all surprised if he were sent to botanise in New Holland. I have much to say on the present state of public affairs; and if you were beside me, you would have to hear it all: but it is a little too much to occupy our brief interview with such matters—now that you are beyond the ocean and not at all concerned by them, and that I, though on this side of the great water, am so situated as to have nothing to hope and almost nothing to fear from any political change whatever. I consign you therefore if desirous of additional information, to two well-written Articles by Jeffrey in the last Edinburgh Review—and, if you know the maxim audi alteram partem, to sundry delirious speculations from the pen of Mr. Southey, wherein these points are handled at considerable length in the Quarterly Review.

I betake me to private history, in which, though with equal dulness and haste, I am sure of exciting deeper interest. . . .

And now, my friend, I must draw this wretched tissue to a close. My paper is coarse, my mind has been distracted and hurried by a thousand cross accidents since I began to write: I have written stupidly and tediously of course; nothing has been as it should be but the wish to please you, which I do most conscientiously pretend to. I am persuaded you will pardon my inconsistencies and blunders for the sake of this last circumstance; nay, further, that in spite of all my faults you will write me at immense length by the ship's return. I have said that it would not much surprise me if you returned on board of her ; it will hardly please any one so highly as myself : yet if so be not, if we must not see each other for many long eventful years, I hope both of us will always retain a happy and heartfelt remembrance of the many days we have spent together ; and neglect no opportunity of cultivating an intercourse so pleasant, by every means that yet remains to us. My Mother sends her most kind respects to you and best wishes for your—safe return—so she phrases it ; my Father is prevented by absence from joining at the present moment in this wish, but Alick and Meg, who are beside me—and every other heart about Mainhill—desire to be most cordially included in it. Bogside, I suppose, has written a letter by this conveyance—so I have not mentioned any domestic news. Edward Irving is at Glasgow, Dr. Chalmers' Assistant ; I spent a week with him on my return from Edinburgh. He succeeds wonderfully. But I have room for nothing more.

Write to me as fully as you possibly can ; unless you intend to bring yourself: and believe me to be, with the warmest wishes for your prosperity, my dear friend, ever most faithfully yours,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LIV.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Academy, Annan.¹

EDINBURGH, 7th December 1820.

MY DEAR BROTHER JACK—I had no time last night to write a reply to your lively little note ; and besides, I gathered from some expressions in it that you intended to write me by the Annan carrier — Richardson as I conjectured ; — for which reason I was the more willing to postpone the operation that so I might shoot two dogs with one ball, Anglice, answer two letters at once. Richardson is here, and you have not written ; nor considering the time, am I surprised at it. You will write to me next time, I know, at great length as to everything that concerns you. Be free in stating all your doubts and queries and difficulties : I shall be as free in answering them.

¹ John Carlyle was now at the Annan Academy, teaching and preparing for College at Edinburgh.

It is very fortunate that you have got Fergusson to hear you a lesson ; stick to it while you have such an opportunity ; against winter you will be ready for Edinburgh. I confess, however, that I feel a reluctance in advising you to diligence ; because I know you are likely to be at least diligent enough, and present appearances give me room to fear, not that you will become a sluggard, but that you will become a drudge—and thus being ever more enticed by the charms of literature, and ever more repulsed by the foreignness of everyday mortals, that you will play the same miserable game that I have played, sacrificing both health and peace of mind to the vain shadows of ambition—unattainable by one of us, and useless though they were attainable. Therefore, my good boy, let me entreat you by the warmth of brotherly affection—to beware of this, to guard against the first advances of debility, to enjoy yourself in society by every honest means, and to regard it as a certain fact that continuous study will waste away the very best constitution, the loss of which is poorly, most poorly, recompensed by all the learning and philosophy of the human race. I fear you will not listen to me : young men feel flattered when it is said they are studying themselves into ill-health ; but they bitterly regret their conduct when it is too late. Believe my experience, my dear Jack ; may it never become yours !

I have been led into these reflections, because I am not yet quite recovered from a wicked rebellion of the intestines—produced by the change of air, I suppose, and also by inclement circumstances in which that change was brought about. I have studied none yet, and read next to none. Indeed I must be re-established before I can study to any purpose. . . .

I hope you still go home on Saturdays ; and “janner¹” for an hour or two with our dearly-beloved Alick and other as dear friends. It will lighten your spirits. Be good to my Mother and Father—they have given us much, the time is coming to repay it. But I must out to walk, windy and dark though it be. Write immensely to—Your affectionate brother,

¹ Janner, jawner = to talk idly.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LV.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 2d January 1821.

MY DEAR ALICK— . . . I see easily that the Black Dwarf and Old Mortality have hurried you rather, in your epistle ; which, however, contains the gratifying intelligence—still eminently gratifying, though happily it is common—of your continued good health and peaceable situation. The times are hard, my man ; and the hope of their improvement is still distant : but with a sound body and a free spirit, our life is not without its charms. . . .

I am got better considerably, in point of health ; so be not uneasy on that score. Health I feel to be the greatest of all earthly goods—the basis of them all ; and therefore I shall study the maintenance of it with primary care. I get low, very low in spirits, when the clay-house is out of repair ; indeed I almost think at such times that health alone would make me happy ; and in fact when strong outwardly, I seldom feel depressed within. . . . I have translated a portion of Schiller's History of the Thirty Years' War (it is all about Gustavus and the fellow-soldados of Dugald Dalgetty, your dearly-beloved friend) ; and sent it off, with a letter introduced by Tait the Review-bookseller, to Longmans and Co., London. Tait was to send it away very soon, in a package of newly published books, and to accompany it with a letter, setting forth that I was one of the most hopeful youths of the part, and that hence it were well for the men of Paternoster Row to secure my co-operation forthwith. The answer will come in (perhaps) three weeks. To say truth, my Brother, I am not sanguine in this matter : But now is not the time to discuss it, both because my paper is waning, and because out of fatigue from travelling I might give you too dark a picture of that and all my other schemes. . . .

Irving is a kind good fellow. He would have me come and spend some months with him, because he thought I felt uncomfortable here; and he had all the sappy hospitality of Bailie Jarvie's children at command. William Graham¹ is also a friend and a deserving one: I could pass my time swimmingly among them: but I must work with my own hands, and work while it is called to-day. You cannot conceive what a week I have had. Fat contented merchants—shovelling their beef over by the pound, and swilling their wine without measure, declaiming on politics and religion, joking and jeering and flowing and swaggering along with all their heart. I viewed them with a curious, often with a satisfied eye. But there is a time for all. Last night, I was listening to music and the voice of song amid dandy clerks and sparkling females; laughing at times even to soreness at the marvellous Dr. John Scott (see Blackwood's Magazine); and to-night, I am alone in this cold city—alone to cut my way into the heart of its benefices by the weapons of my own small quiver. Yet let us be of cheer, for braw days are comin': and now, my boy, at this noisy season accept the prayer, put up for you and all our family, that many new years, and far happier ones, may be in store for each of us, that we may all love one another here, and in due time be made fit for that better land, where the just shall flourish, where the wickedness of men and the painfulness of Nature shall be hid from us, and peace and virtue substituted in their room!—Ever yours,

¹ Merchant in Glasgow and Laird of Burnswark in Annandale; of whom there is a long account in the Reminiscences, i. 164.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LVI.—TO ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 10th January 1821.

MY DEAR BROTHER— . . . My possessions of worldly comfort are still mostly in perspective. Yet I live in hope, and no sooner is one scheme blasted than another springs up instead of it. Brewster is to settle with me about my writings whenever I like to go over: and what might be better he professes great readiness to furnish me with a letter of introduction to Thomas Campbell, who has lately been appointed Editor of a Magazine in London, the publishers of which are said to offer about fifteen guineas a sheet. I must try somewhat for Campbell. O for one day of such vigorous health and such elastic spirits as I have had of old! I will try, however. Brewster came to me on the street to-day, and talked long: he seems to feel that I can be of some use to him, and therefore he treats me gently. I was at dinner with him the other day; and there were Professor Wallis, Telford the engineer, Jardine, another of the same, and one Wright, a very ugly loud-speaking man. They are persons to hear whom would make one admire how they have got the name and the emolument they enjoy at present. Telford spoke of his "friend the Duke" of this, and his "friend the Marquis" of that—all honourable men. I left the party without regret to sup with little Murray (you recollect about him), where was to appear M^cDiarmid of Dumfries and M^cCulloch, the great M^cCulloch, better known to you as the “Scotsman.”¹ M^cCulloch fell sick, and we had to content ourselves with one of his coadjutors—a broad-faced, jolly, speculating, muddle-headed person called Ritchie. I debated with Ritchie in a very desultory style about poetry and politics, less to his edification than surprise; and the dapper little M^cDiarmid sat by as umpire of the strife. M^cDiarmid is not “an elegant gentleman;” . . . in mental qualities he is estimable rather than otherwise—showy but unsubstantial—broad but shallow. . . .

After all, perhaps I shall fall into some agreeable society here, and finally be restored to something like steady peace and comfort. In the meantime, as you remark, I ought to be thankful that I am as I am. Witness Waugh! sad emblem of imprudence! Hunted by duns, destitute of cash, he has left his luggage to make good the payment of his lodging, and is now winding his zigzag way among the purse-bearers of Annandale, to raise a little money from the wrecks of his prosperity. No one but pities Waugh, no one but blames him. . . .

¹ To become still better known as a writer on Political Economy, and the compiler of various useful works.

[End of letter awaiting.]

LVII.—To his MOTHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, Wednesday night,
10th January 1821.

MY DEAR MOTHER— . . . I am afraid that you take my case too deeply to heart. It is true, I am toiling on the waves, and my vessel looks but like a light canoe; yet surely the harbour is before me, and in soberness when I compare my tackle with that of others, I cannot doubt hardly that I shall get within the pier at last. Without figure, I am not a genius, but a rather sharp youth, discontented and partly mismanaged, ready to work at aught but teaching, and to be satisfied with the ordinary recompense of every honest son of Adam, food and raiment and common respectability. Can I fail to get them if I continue steadfast? No, I cannot fail. The way, indeed, is weary; it leads through a dry parched land wherein few waters be; but how happy it is that I journey unattended by Remorse! that my conscience, though it wound, does not sting me; that my heart, when it faints, does not condemn! I ought to be grateful that it is so; and to bear these "light afflictions" calmly—they are not sent without need.

You observe, Mother, I talk about my own affairs most fluently: yet there are other affairs about which I am anything rather than indifferent. It will be changing the direction more than the nature of my thoughts (for this also is one of my concerns) if I inquire particularly into your situation at Mainhill. How are you? Tell me largely when you write. I fear your health is feeble: I conjure you be careful of it. Do you get tea—the weary tea—alone now? By the little table ben the house? I advise you to use it frequently: it is excellent for weak stomachs. And do not, I entreat you, let any considerations of thrift or such things restrain you in those cases. None of us is rich; but we should certainly be poor indeed, if among us we could not muster enough for such a purpose. Keep yourself from cold most carefully this unhealthy season, and read the Worthies or anything that will satisfy that high enthusiasm of your mind, which, however you may disbelieve it, is quite of a piece with my own. Do you still get the Repository? I observe there is to be a fresh Magazine at Glasgow, embracing the interests of the United Secession Church. I wish it could be got for you.

But here I must end. A happy new year to you, my dear Mother, and many, many of them—to be a blessing to us all! Write to me next time in the most ample manner. My best love to all the children.—Ever your affectionate son,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Do you care about that fish? One kind costs $3\frac{1}{2}$ d., the other $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. per pound. Boil it, change the water, and—*beit*¹ butter.

¹ Scotch for “add.”

LVIII.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Annan.

EDINBURGH, 10th February 1821.

I send you the Virgil, my dear Jack, according to promise ; and I need not say how much I wish you luck in the perusal of it. By help of the notes, and marginal interpretation—especially if David still continues with you—I do not expect that you will find much difficulty in penetrating the meaning of this harmonious singer : and, though you are not likely to reckon him “the Prince of Poets,” you are still less likely to miss being struck with the high elegance and regular flowing pomp both of his thoughts and language.

I have a long sheet here before me, boy, and the consciousness that I have lately written you three or four most leaden letters, to inspire me with greater eagerness for amendment : but alas ! it is not to-day that I can amend. I have not been in worse trim for writing this twelve-month. If you saw me sitting here with my lean and sallow visage, you would wonder how those long bloodless bony fingers could be made to move at all—even though the aching brain were by miracle enabled to supply them with materials in sufficient abundance. I have been sick, very sick, since Monday last—indeed I have scarcely been one day right, since I came back to this accursed, stinking, reeky mass of stones and lime and dung. . . . Were it by moral suffering that one sunk—by oppression, love or hatred, or the thousand ways of heartbreak—it might be tolerable, there might at least be some dignity in the fall; but here!—I conjure thee, Jack, to watch over thy health as the most precious of earthly things. I believe at this moment I would consent to become as ignorant as a Choctaw—so I were as sound of body.

Upon the whole it seems very cruel in me to describe my miseries in such glowing colours (does it not?) and make you unhappy, when all that you can do for me is to be unhappy on my account. The thing is so, I do admit, Jack, but really I am grown a very weak creature of late. The heart longs for some kind of sympathy: and in Edinburgh I find little of it—except from the well-meant though ineffectual kindness of Geo. Johnston, who indeed watches over me very attentively. Here was the gritstone theologian, Crone, about half an hour ago—he had called upon me twice—not to ask for my welfare, but to glean information about a history of the West Indies, information which the dog means to utter as his own in some house where he is teaching. He said he was very sorry for me: I could have thrown him out at the window for his sorrow; but contented myself with saying that I knew well how deeply my condition affected his most compassionate soul.

You need not tell any one of those things except Sandy—not our Mother or Father, it would but vex them; and they are not young and strong and full of hope like you to stand vexation. Nor would I have you to trouble yourselves much on my account. I shall surely get over this yet: and if summer were come I am thinking it will be well to secure quarters about Kirkcaldy or some bathing town and transport myself thither with all my tackle, to enjoy the manifold benefits of such a station. There is a project on foot about translating one D'Aubuisson, a Frenchman's geology—a large book, for the first edition of which I am to have 60 guineas—the same sum for every succeeding edition. Brewster was very diligent in forwarding it; and though I neither like the book nor the terms excessively, I feel much obliged to him for his conduct. There is also an edition of [seal covers] works with a Life about which I [was] speaking to Tait—and [I have] not yet been able to go and hear his answer, which, however, I do not strongly expect to be favourable. Now with some such job as one of those—with good sea-breezes, and decent people about me, I think I could get quite whole and well after all that's come and gone. This grievous state of languor and debility—the only thing that can break my heart—I feel inclined to hope may be but temporary, the transition from youth to hardened manhood: in a year or two it may be all gone. There is Waugh (ey mon! etc.) was once ill, and now never knows the name of distemper. Do not mind me, then, my boy: be diligent at your studies—yet careful of excess ; and next winter you will live with me here—and be my comforter, and I will be your tutor in return. Give my warmest love to all at Mainhill. Remember me to Ben Nelson if you see him.—Your affectionate brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

John Fergusson is come in, and I have consented to crawl out with him and try the St. Bernard's spa—a fountain on the north of Edinburgh.

LIX.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

KIRKCALDY, 19th February 1821.

. . . I know there is within me something different from the vulgar herd of mortals ; I think it is something superior ; and if once I had overpassed those bogs and brakes and quagmires, that lie between me and the free arena, I shall make some fellows stand to the right and left—or I mistake me greatly. . . .

I accompanied Irving over here on Saturday last, took up my abode at the Provost Swan's, and as on all hands they kindly invite me to continue, I have allowed Irving to return, and I am to continue here for a few days.

Already the sea-breezes are acting beneficially on me; and in two or three days I expect they will have set me in such a case that zealous exercise will keep me moderately well in that old smoky city—the smoke of which I sicken at—even while viewing it across the pure azure frith of Forth. You know this “long town,” and you can easily conceive with what emotions of melancholy pleasure, of joy and sadness, I traverse all the well-known turnings of it. There is something mournful in the view of a half-forgotten scene, associated with many of our pains and pleasures, something that reflects back on us the rapid never-ceasing flight of time, and makes us solemn or pensive, even though our recollections may be mostly of sorrows that we are now escaped from. I view Kirkcaldy like an old acquaintance that is fast forgetting me, that I am fast forgetting: yet there are some people in it whom I could wish to remember and be remembered by. They are not many ; they are the more valuable for that. . . .

LX.—To his FATHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 25th February 1821.

MY DEAR FATHER—You would get the letter addressed to Sandy from Kirkcaldy about Thursday morning ; and I trust it would have the effect of calming your solicitude on account of my health and outward welfare, about which I have lately given you so much unprofitable anxiety. The sea-breezes of Fife, and the kind attentions of its inhabitants, produced the most salutary results on me ; I grew better every day, and in the course of a few weeks I doubt not I should have been as strong as ever at any period of my life. It was with regret that I quitted them on Friday to meet Irving here, who, however, in the interim had been forced to return home. I felt in a state of decided convalescence, which I am happy to add has since continued without interruption.

.

At present I look forward to a busy and therefore a contented summer, in which I shall accomplish much, and among other things the long-wished-for results of gaining for myself some permanent employment, so that I may no longer wander about the earth a moping hypochondriac, the soul eating up itself for want of something else to act upon, or a withered school-master eyeing my fellow-men with a suspicion and solitary shrinking, which should be peculiar to felons and other violators of the law.

In fact, matters have a more promising appearance with me at the present date than they have had for a long season. Besides Jack's letter and some others which awaited my return from Fife, there was one which I read with indifference, abandoning the proposed undertaking of translating D'Aubuisson (for which consult Sandy); and one, which I read with considerable interest, proffering to me on the part of Bookseller Tait to become a candidate for the translating of a French book, Maltebrun's Geography, which one Adam Black, Tait's brother-in-law, is engaged with at present, and designs to put into fresh hands. Two persons (unknown to me) are to submit specimens of their work, I am to do so likewise; and Tait assures me that, if Black had known sooner, there would have been no competition in the case. So that I am not without hope of getting this job, and if the judge be a correct one, of deserving it. You may think the latter proviso is like dropping feather-beds out of a window from which one is soon to be precipitated in person: but within my own mind, I feel a kind of assurance that I can surpass my fellow-translators, unless they are far superior to the usual run of such creatures. And if I divine right, it will be very advantageous for me: a steady employment (the book extends to five or six large volumes—of which only one and a part are finished) that I can address myself to in any humour—for it requires no study; and by means of which it would not be difficult to clear the matter of £200 per annum for a considerable time. I shall hear of it by and by—like enough I may fail in those expectations; but we can do either way.

.

But my sheet is done and my feet are cold—good reasons both for drawing to a close. I long to hear news of you all; but I suppose Farries had stolen a march on you, or you expected me home. My love to all there.—Ever your affectionate son,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

George Johnston and I have been working all day at Maltebrun—or I would have written to Jack and Sandy. They of course will write at great length next opportunity.

LXI.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Annan.

EDINBURGH, 9th March 1821.

MY DEAR JACK—I have wasted this whole blessed evening in reading poetry and stuff, while I should have been writing a substantial life of Necker, out of materials accumulated two days ago; and now that eleven o'clock is struck, I may as well devote the remaining hour to your gratification, and my own, in this new mode, which, if equally idle with the mode it succeeds, has at least the merit of amusing two at once. . . . I am considerably clearer than when I wrote to Sandy, the day before yesterday, and I should have been still more so had not this afternoon been wet, and so prevented me from breathing the air of Arthur's Seat, a mountain close beside us where the atmosphere is pure as a diamond, and the prospect grander than any you ever saw. The blue, majestic, everlasting ocean, with the Fife hills swelling gradually into the Grampians behind it on the north; rough crags and rude precipices at our feet ("where not a hillock rears its head unsung"), with Edinburgh at their base, clustering proudly over her rugged foundations, and covering with a vapoury mantle the jagged, black, venerable masses of stonework, that stretch far and wide and show like a city of fairyland. There's for you, man! I saw it all last evening—when the sun was going down—and the moon's fine crescent (like a pretty silver creature as it is) was riding quietly above me. Such a sight does one good; though none be there to share it, except the Jurisconsult—"poorest of the sons of earth."

But I am leading you astray after my fantasies—when I should be inditing plain prose. It is painful for me to learn that you already begin to experience the effects of too close application. Let it be a warning, my dear Jack, I solemnly charge you; or the issue will make you repent it bitterly, when it cannot be remedied. Why do you sit so constantly poring over books? Go out, I tell you; and talk with any mortal to relieve your mind rather than converse perpetually with the imagination. What would you be at, man? Your learning is advanced most respectably; and depend upon it there is a learning more available often than the learning of books,—the learning of the ways of men, which cannot be acquired except from conversing with them and observing them. Speak with all honest men then, enter into their views, and be one of them. I have suffered deeply from ignorance of this counsel, which I offer you with all the warmth of fraternal affection. Do not disregard it. I would advise you also to bethink you of some Profession, on which to fix your endeavours; for it is an unlucky thing to be drifting on the waves of chance as I am now, and must long be, without companion or guide on my track, which for aught I know may lead me into whirlpools or breakers after all. What think you of the Church? Or of Medicine? Or can you teach for a livelihood? Consider this matter, and write me about it fully. In fact you must study to be more copious in your details henceforth. Is not paper cheap, the postage nothing? And what need for caring how you write to me. Tell me everything—whether you are merry or sad—busy or idle—your whole manière d'être et d'exister. Is Waugh still with you? Remember me to the luckless. Are you teaching Ben? Is Davie teaching you? How do you like Maro? How are they at Mainhill? etc. etc. etc. . . .

But hark! the lugubrious chant of our watchman—"ha-alf-pa-ast twelve!" So Good-night, my boy. Go to Mainhill on Saturday, and say that my heart thanks them for all their kindness; and that if I do not get quite well in a week or two, I will profit by it. My love to them all nominatim.—I remain, your affectionate brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LXII.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

EDINBURGH, 18th March 1821.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—I have just read over your letter, and to show you that I am not altogether extinguished in sloth, I sit down to pen an answer instantly. The colossal Wallenstein with Thekla the angelical, and Max her impetuous lofty-minded lover, are all gone to rest; I have closed Schiller for a night; and what can I do better than chat for one short hour with my old, my earliest friend? I have nothing to tell you, it is true; but the mere neighbourhood of your image brings so many pleasing though pensive recollections, so many shadows of departed years along with it, that I may well write without having anything to say. And do not fear, my gentle brother, that I will lead you into the mazes of Kantism; I know you have but a limited relish for such mysteries, and among my many faults, an enemy even would not reckon the inordinate desire of making proselytes. As to Kant, and Schelling and Fichte and all those worthies, I confess myself but an esoteric after all ; and whoever can imagine that Stewart and Hume, with Reid and Brown to help them, have sounded all the depths of our nature, or, which is better, can contrive to overlook those mysteries entirely,—is too fortunate a gentleman for me to intermeddle with. Nor shall I trouble you with my views of men,—at least not greatly ; and for a like reason. I have been a solitary dreamer all my days, wrapt up in dim imaginings, strange fantasies, and gleams of all things ; so that when I give utterance to the sensations produced on me by the actual vulgar narrow stupid world of realities, you very justly think me on the verge of—coma. But toleration, man ! toleration is all I ask, and what I am ready to give. Do you take your Lipsius, your Crombie, your Schweighäuser ; and let me be doing with Lake poets, Mystics, or any trash I can fall in with : why should we not cast an eye of cheering, give a voice of welcome, to each other as our paths become mutually visible, though they are no longer one?

I meant to give you my history for the by-gone months. It is easily done. I have had the most miserable health—was in a low fever for two weeks lately, meditating to come home, and actually did elope to Fife; and during all the winter I have had such delightful companions to interrupt my long solitudes, such intellectual, high-spirited men as you have no idea of. My progress has been proportionable. It boots not, as you say, to indulge reproachful afterthoughts. Indeed I have begun to apply the all-consuming maxim cui bono? to study as well as other things; and to ask how can it serve one to be learned and refined and elevate? Is it not to imbibe a feeling of pity for the innocent dolts around one; and of disgust (alas!) at the thistles and furze upon which they are faring sumptuously every day? The most enviable thing, I often think, in all the world, must be the soundest of the seven sleepers: for he reposes deeply in his corner; and to him the tragi-comedy of life is as painless as it is paltry. But to return—I have tried about twenty plans this winter in the way of authorship; they have all failed; I have about twenty more to try: and if it does but please the Director of all things to continue the moderate share of health now restored to me, I will make the doors of human society fly open before me yet, notwithstanding my petards will not burst, or make only noise when they do: I must mix them better, plant them more judiciously; they shall burst and do execution too. But all this, you say, is nothing to the point—what are you doing? Teaching two Dandies Mathematics; who leave me (Io Bacche!) in a month; compiling for Encyclopædias (hewing of wood and drawing of water); I was translating—and am soon to Review. Waugh has relented, for his book is reeling like a drunken man,—got himself re-introduced to me, and sent over a book lately—Joanna Baillie's Legends, so I beg, Sir, you will view the embryo Aristarchus with all the gravity in your power.

But to retort the question, what are you doing? Are such geniuses as we, think you, to live crammed up as it were in the stocks, pinfolded thus, and shut out from all the cheerful ways of men, for ever? And what are the levers you intend to use? Tell me seriously, and think of it seriously, for it demands consideration. I think your classical teaching plan bids fair if you mature it well; and really I would not advise any one to launch, as I was forced to do, upon the roaring deep, so long as he can stay ashore. For me, the surges and the storm are round my skiff; yet I must on—on, lest biscuit fail me ere I reach the trade-wind and sail with others.

This I confess is a very pragmatical Frank-Dixon-ish way of talking to you; but it is too late now for mending it. I shall be less figurative next time. . . . “My address” is in your hands; see how you will use it—diligently and soon, if you care a farthing for your old friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LXIII.—To his MOTHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, Wednesday morning
[March 1821].

MY DEAR MOTHER—Though you have not said a word to me personally for a great while, I am well aware that there is no one in the world who has experienced more anxiety on my account of late, or will experience more satisfaction at being told that I am now relieved from my state of languor and pain, into a state of comparative strength and happiness. I know not whether I am rightly thankful to Providence for this great blessing, but certainly I am “unco gled”¹ as your pauper said ; and I cannot resist the desire of communicating the agreeable intelligence to you myself, though very much straitened in time, and obliged, as you see, to content myself with a half-sheet, notwithstanding your well-known repugnance to such penurious doings. Another object which I have in view in writing to you is to inquire most minutely into your own state of health, which I fear is nothing so good as it should be. My dear Mother, let me counsel you to spare no trouble or care, with regard to this. Endeavour to avoid all things that will fret or discompose your mind, be as much as possible in the open air, and go about to visit your friends and acquaintance in the neighbourhood, whenever you can by any means go. I am most anxious to hear a full and faithful account of this matter from your own hand.

¹ Greatly pleased.

.

You must write to me, if you can find any time. I am ignorant, and not patiently ignorant, of all your movements. You must send me a description of the whole. For myself, besides what I have detailed in many recent letters to my various correspondents at Mainhill, there is little that I can add at present: I write a very little, read some and walk some; and that is almost all my history. Last Sabbath I was to hear Dr. M'Crie (Author of Knox, His Life), who preaches to [a] few poor people within two or three hundred yards of this. He is an earnest-looking, lean, acute-minded man; with much learning and thought, but no eloquence. It did me good to see the poor people with their clean faces, their attentive looks, and to hear our own old St. Paul's and St. Peter's (venerable tunes!) chanted with so much alacrity and apparent devoutness. It brought the little meeting-house at home, and all the innocent joyance of childhood back, to mingle strangely with the agitations of after-life. But I have done. Is there any book that I can get you, or any thing that I can do for you? Speak if there is; and gratify your affectionate and thankful boy,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LXIV.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Annan.

EDINBURGH, Wednesday [March 1821].

MY DEAR JACK—Twelve o'clock is past; but I confide in Garthwaite's unpunctuality a little, and send you two lines of advice about your studies merely—for about this time, I guess, you are reading the letter sent by Gavin, which will satisfy you on all other points.

You have certainly been very diligent if you can at all read Virgil and Sallust in so short a time. I really wonder at it. You must give up the Georgics, however, I think, without delay. They are the most uninteresting and by far the most difficult of all Virgil's writings. Take to the Eneid immediately; you will like it far better. Do you mind the Grammar? and the scanning? Attend to both particularly. For Sallust, you cannot go wrong. Catiline is an admirable narrative; and the writer of it ever shows himself the same lynx-eyed, hard-headed, bitter little terrier; to whom nothing was agreeable because nothing was pure; and still more because he was not pure himself. Crispus was a rip of a body, in his youth. When you read the Eneid do not fail to admire the calm gracefulness, the stately and harmonious diction, the clear imagination of Maro; but do not [neglect] to have your winnow-cloth expanded by the grandeur and immensity of Milton, or your heart quickened by his stern and elevated strength of soul. Each after his kind. Think too that you (poor Jack in Bitty Geel's) do actually read the very words and admire the very thoughts that Augustus read and admired two thousand years ago, and all great men since. Let this be a spur in the head, which is better than two in the heel—than the pressure of want—that is—or the lucre of gain.

But do not, do not, I repeat it, neglect your morning and evening walks—and your talks and laughs and recreations. It is well to read Johnson's Lives; though the man is prejudiced to a pitch (see Milton and Gray), he has great power of head, and his insensibility to the higher beauties of poetry does not extend to the most complicated questions of reasoning. His Rambler is very good; but not so amusing. Can you not get Shakespeare, or Byron? Goldsmith's essays are "capital"—in style and liveliness. Dean Swift is a merry grinning dog. Did you ever see his Tale of a Tub? John Johnstone (Mrs. Dr.'s) has it and will lend it. Johnson's Journey to the Western Isles is likewise good. And Don Quixote—read it, till your sides crack, which they will do, if you have risi[ble or]gans. Try if you can get Russell's

History of Modern Europe. George Irving will procure it from the library of the burgh. Except the last, those things are principally for amusement ; yet if you attend to the style—and imitate it judiciously, they will profit you not a little. At any rate they fill the head pleasantly, and therefore usefully.

We shall talk of your school when I come home, about August or so. Perhaps you may get some teaching here, which will do better. Go on and prosper, my boy ! There is no fear. Adieu !—Your affectionate brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LXV.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL, Ruthwell Manse.

EDINBURGH, 4th April 1821.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—Your pupil George John having it in view to proceed shortly home again to Ruthwell, you cannot be surprised that I seize the opportunity which this circumstance affords me to disport a little in the way of innocent chat with you—and relieve my solitude by an emblem of society, since I cannot get the real article to my mind. Le plus grand des plaisirs, c'est l'abandon de soi-même : in order to enjoy it, however imperfectly, I have kicked out the frolicksome Christopher North, and the "Monthly"—in spite of its paralytic affections,—with a host of other écrivassiers, who have beset me all day ; and confused me with their incessant and unmusical hubbub—driving all old thoughts away, and putting no new one in their room.

It is natural for you to expect that, seeing I have volunteered a letter, I must needs have some important news to tell you—something fresh in the literary world ; or at least something very strange in my own poor history. Neither of your suppositions is correct. The literary world is going on much as it was wont : frisking Reviewers come forth once a quarter, tipsy Magazinemen once a month ; both as usual and see around them a nameless throng, digging like moles at Encyclopædias, Journals,

" Trip it as they go,
On the light fantastic toe,"

Monthly Reviews, etc. etc., quite in the old style. Nor has anything particular happened to myself since I wrote last to you. I am moving on, weary and heavy laden, with very fickle health, and many discomforts—still looking forward to the future (brave future!) for all the accommodations and enjoyments that render life an object of desire. Then shall I no longer play a candle-snuffer's part in the Great Drama; or if I do, my salary will be raised: then shall — which you see is just “use and wont.”

Our old acquaintances here are many of them alive; but few, very few of them, anything more. By “the long positive prescription” they have acquired a kind of right to live, and they exercise it quietly—travelling about the city to diffuse the knowledge of Ruddiman¹ and the Horn Book, consuming a stated, stinted portion of indifferent whisky punch, scenting every breeze for dead parsons, and trusting that Providence will not be blind to merit always. Such are the nascent pillars of our venerable

¹ Ruddiman's Rudiments of the Latin Tongue was for a century at least well known to every Scottish schoolboy.

Church. I see few of them, and desire to see still fewer. Murray is here, with his Galloway History. Upon the whole, Murray is among the best of them. He has an inexhaustible fund of activity—wishes greatly to be loved, and takes the proper mode of becoming so: he possesses indeed very little more than the small peculium of knowledge customary in such cases, but he has some warmth of heart, and is not without gleams of a generous enthusiasm to cherish thoughts a little way exalted above the mire and clay of mere physical existence. When Murray can snatch an hour from his far-extended pedagogics, he visits me now and then. . . .

They have got (on a eu) intelligence of Frank Dixon. He has eaten victuals with the Governor of Bermudas, drunk kill-devil (rum-toddy) with many of the planters there; and gives high promise of being useful in illuminating the heads and edifying the hearts both of men and boys on that “ever-vexed” isle.¹

¹ “Having no good prospect of Kirk promotion in Scotland, he (Dixon) had accepted some offer to be Presbyterian chaplain

I hear not a word of poor James Johnstone. Ubi terrarum, where in all the world is he? If at New York still—he might have an introduction to a first-rate man there, did I but know his address. Poor James! I cry to think of the spoiler Time, how he dashes us unhappy worms far and wide,—now here, now there—in this noisy vortex of things. It is but few years since we three were—no matter.

My dear Mitchell, thou must write to me as soon as may be. Doubt not, I shall be more scientific and philosophical and steady next time I reply. Really the fiend Mephistopheles catches one at times. Excuse his capers and his grins, believing that in spite of all, I remain in sincerity your faithful friend, and preacher to the Scotch in Bermuda, and lifted anchor thither with many regrets and good wishes from us all.”—Reminiscences, i. 147.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

My kindest, most respectful compliments to Mr. Duncan and his Lady.

LXVI.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 11th April 1821.

MY DEAR BROTHER—I had just concluded the first meal of the day now passing over me, when a tall wench interrupted my reflections, by lugging in that respectable box—the sight of which never fails to inspire me with agreeable ideas of various kinds. It gives me promise not only of substantial accommodations for the outward man, but also of intelligence refreshing for the inward man, and it holds out the prospect of an hour or two to be spent agreeably in transmitting intelligence from myself in return. The second gratification I have already enjoyed; the first is certainly in store for me; and the last, you see, I am purposing to make sure of without delay.

Your sheet (the first real sheet for a long time) is well filled and pleasantly. . . . I daresay you are very busy at this period,—tilling the soil for potatoes, or harrowing it over corn, or fallowing it, or doing twenty things besides: so I do not look for such minute and comprehensive despatches yet as I shall get by and by. Only be as liberal as you can; do not fail to give me something, and I shall be satisfied.

There is nothing different in my condition, since I wrote last to you. . . .

We must all fight and fight—if we would live in this world. I often think they are happier that fight for solid necessary objects, than they that vex themselves in vain for dainty cates to satisfy the boundless cravings of a spirit left unoccupied. To see them hunting and drinking and debauching all ways; dancing, dressing, strutting—not to mention your great conquerors and projectors of various sorts—alas! the mind is languid and tempest-tossed and discontented, do what one will. Your husbandman keeps hold of Health any way; and I tell you the possession of that blessing is better than the empire of the world. If you could penetrate into the hearts of our poor shambling lairds—whether they be dandies or jolly ones, and see the yellowness and flatness of their inward landscape, you would fly with double speed back to your fresh fields and bracing air ; gladly forsaking the switch and quizzer and other *plaiks*¹ invented by French barbers and the like, for the venerable plough—invented by Father Adam himself, and dignified by the usage of patriarchs and heroes, and still better dignified intrinsically as the Upholder of the human race. But a truce with Philosophy. There is no room for her here.

Do you hear anything about Jamie Johnstone of late ? I have inquired often but without success. Tell me next time : and collect news for me from all parts, no matter how empty. I rejoice over the library, and its new chance of existence. Watch over it, in spite of all opposition. Write long, long : believing me to be always, your faithful Brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

What, in the name of wonder, is become of Jack ?

¹ Playthings, baubles.

LXVII.—To his MOTHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, Saturday (candle-lit)[June ? 1821].

MY DEAR MOTHER—I have studied it and find you must again be contented with a half-sheet: my time is short, and my task is great in proportion to it. I read over your little letter with such feelings as all your letters inspire in me, enlivened in the present case by the assurance that your health is tolerable, and your mind comfortable. My dear Mother, I trust Providence will long bountifully continue those blessings to us—for it is to us more than to yourself that they are valuable.

You need not doubt that I shall find employment for your generous anxiety to serve me: indeed you can hardly require more employment, I think, than what you find in those lots of clothes and stuff that I am ever sending home to busy you with. These are bra' white socks, but really I needed them not. And what shall I say of the cakes? What but that I have mumbled over fragments of them all the afternoon? I suppose you put liberal allowances of butter in the dough—they are so much preferable, not to the last sample, but to the one before it. As for the butter, it is most welcome. . . . Many thanks also, my good Mother, for your bundle of camomile. I have laid it by in my trunk, and whether it help the stomach or not, it cannot fail to help the heart every time I look at it. . . . But alas! See how soon our little chit-chat is over—and I must take my leave. We shall meet in August. Pray that it be in peace and comfort. Good-night, my dear Mother!—Your affectionate Son,

THOS. CARLYLE.

LXVIII.—To ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 8th June 1821.

MY DEAR ALICK—Your letter came most opportunely to relieve my anxieties on your account, and also to employ two hours of otherwise unprofitable time in answering it. . . .

I sighed to learn the fate of poor old Rose. She was a good beast in her day; but beasts are mortal as well as men ; and like Cato's son, our Rose "has done her duty." She has seen you through the seed-time ;—which, if I may judge from personal experience here, must have been a task more than usually heavy. We have had such weather ! Ever since May began, a Whirlblast and a Drench, a Whirlblast and a Drench, have been our sad vicissitudes. Yesterday was a day of darkness ; but it set the wind into the west, where I solemnly pray it may continue as long as—possible. Those easterly breezes with their fine freights (of icy vapour, sand, straw, dung, etc., here) are certainly the most entertaining weather one can well fall in with. If you be indigestive and nervous at the time,—it is quite surprising. . . .

Irving was with me lately, during the General Assembly time. The man could not have been kinder to me, had he been a brother. He would needs take me to East Lothian with him for a day or two, to "see the world." We went accordingly ; and though that wretched stomach was full of gall—so that I could neither sleep nor eat to perfection—I was happy as a lark in May. We returned last Thursday. I can say little about their husbandry—though I often thought had you been there what fine questions you would have put: but for the people—I saw the finest sample in the world. There was Gilbert Burns, brother of that immortal ploughman, “that walked in glory on the mountain-side, behind his team;” there was—— But no sheet (much less this) can be enough for them. I came back so full of joy, that I have done nothing since but dream of it.¹ To-morrow I must up and study—for man lives not by dreaming alone. The poor paper you see is over with it. . . . Hoping that our Father and

¹ This was a memorable journey for Carlyle. He says of it in his Reminiscences, i. 174, “It was in one of these visits by Irving himself, without any company, that he took me out to Haddington [the county town of East Lothian, on the banks of the Tyne], to what has since been so momentous through all my subsequent life. We walked and talked,—a good sixteen miles, in the sunny summer afternoon. . . . The end of the journey, and what I saw there, will be memorable to me while life or thought endures,” for then he saw Jane Welsh for the first time. “I was supremely dyspeptic and out of health those three or four days, and they were the beginning of a new life to me.”

Mother and all the rest are well and happy, I remain as usual, my dear Alick, yours truly,

T. CARLYLE.

LXIX.—To Miss WELSH, Haddington.

EDINBURGH, 28th June 1821.

MY DEAR MADAM—It would have been a pleasant spectacle for Mephistopheles or any of his sooty brethren,—in whose eyes, I understand, this restless life of ours appears like a regular Farce, only somewhat dull at times,—to have surveyed my feelings before opening your parcel the other night, and after opening it: to have seen with what hysterical speed I undid the gray cover; how I turned over the poor tomes; how I shook them, and searched them through and through; and found—Miss Welsh's "compliments" to Mr. Carstile, a gentleman in whom it required no small sagacity to detect my own representative! Upon the whole, I suppose, you did well to treat me so. I had dreamed and hoped, indeed; but what right had I to hope, or even to wish?

Those latter volumes of the Allemagne will perplex you, I fear. The third in particular is very mysterious; now and then quite absurd. Do not mind it much. Noehden¹ is not come, the London Smacks being all becalmed. I hope it will arrive in time to let us begin Lessing and Schiller and the rest, against October, without impediment. I shall send it out instantly.

I had a hundred thousand things to tell you; but now I may not mention one of them. Those compliments have put the whole to flight almost entirely: there remains little more than, as it were, a melancholy echo of what has been,

Infantumve animae, flentes in limine primo.

Edward Irving and I go down to Annandale about the first of August; he for two weeks, I for as many months. In the meantime, if there is any other book that I can get you, or any kind of service within the very utmost circle of my ability, that can promote your satisfaction even in the slenderest degree,—I do entreat you earnestly to let me know. This is not mere palabra; it originates in a wish to serve you—which must remain ungratified, I presume, but is not the less heartfelt on that account. Farewell!—I am always, your affectionate friend,

¹ Noehden's German Grammar, which Carlyle had ordered from London for Miss Welsh.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Irving's packet was duly forwarded.

LXX.—To JOHN A. CARLYLE, Annan.

EDINBURGH, 19th July 1821.

MY DEAR JACK— . . . I do not precisely know what week I shall be down; but it cannot easily be beyond the third or so from this date.

. . . I am going to ride continually when I get home; it is better than walking: and often as I have been baulked, I am not without hope of finding permanent benefit from the operation. At all events I must try: without some improvement in the constitution, I am as good as dead in the eye of law already; good for nothing but lolling about the room, reading poetry, imagining and fancying and fretting and fuming—all to no purpose earthly. I have studied none or written none for many days. Nevertheless I am moderately comfortable or even happy at present. My confidence in Fortune seems to increase as her offers to me diminish. I have very seldom been poorer than I am; or more feeble or more solitary (if kindred minds form society); and yet I have at no time felt less disposition to knuckle to low persons, or to abate in any way of the stubborn purposes I have formed, or to swerve from the track—thorny and desolate as it is—which I have chosen for journeying through this world. I foresee much trouble before me, but there are joys too: and, joy or not joy, I must forward now. When you launch a boat upon the falls of Niagara, it must go down the roaring cataract, though rocks and ruin lie within the profound abyss below: and just so if a man taste the magic cup of literature, he must drink of it for ever, though bitter ingredients enough be mixed with the liquor. . . .

Do not too proudly look down upon the society you can find in Annan. Believe my sad experience, that is a sad error. I know well enough your comrades are "a feeble folk;" but still they are a folk; and depend upon it, you will repent this gloomy seclusion of yourself from their accustomed haunts—how barren and beaten soever—if you persist in it. There is no real happiness, Jack, out of the common routines of life. Happy he who can walk in them daily, and yet ever be casting his eye over the sublime scenery which solicits us from the far and elevated regions of philosophy! I have missed this rare combination, you observe, and I am paying for it. Do not you do likewise! Be social and frank and friendly with all honest persons. Practice will soon make it easy, and the reward is wholesome and abundant. Go out, I bid you, from the camera obscura of Bitty Geel; go out frequently and talk—talk even with the Jurist, Fergusson, Irving, or any of them.

When I get home, I am going to exhibit all this more at large and in more luminous order—appealing to myself, as I may well do, for proof experimental of a theory which I can so easily demonstrate à priori. Muster all your counter-arguments before my appearance. And when will that be? So soon as I have got that beggarly article The Netherlands (for which I can find next to no materials) off my hands,—and I began working at it some days since. Irving and I spoke of travelling by the west somewhere: we have not arranged it yet. But this Netherlands is the main bar; I have no pluck in me for such things at present—yet it must be clamped together in some shape, and shall if I keep wagging. Tell David Fergusson that I am charmed with his manuscript; it is the prettiest ever was written for the Encyclopædia, and perfectly correct. I shall give you enough to write in harvest—at present I have nothing.

.

My love to all at Mainhill, including Nancy, our cousin, if she be with you still. Adieu!—
Your affectionate Brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LXXI.—To his MOTHER, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, Saturday evening
[July 1821].

MY DEAR MOTHER—I have still a few minutes on hand before the time of delivering up my packet to the care of Garthwaite; I cannot easily employ them better than in writing a line or two for your perusal. A line or two, you see, is all that this paper will hold; and in fact I do not need much more. I am to see you very soon, when we shall meet over a savoury dish of tea down-the-house; and discuss in concert all that has happened to each of us since we parted. That will be a much finer method than the tardy plan of exchanging letters—which, however copious, are always a very unfaithful and inadequate emblem of the truth.

I care not how soon I were down at Mainhill: for this city is fast getting very unpleasant. The smell of it, or rather the hundred thousand smells are altogether pestilential at certain hours. And then the dust, and, more than all together, the noise—of many animals, and many carts, and fishwives innumerable; not to mention the men selling water (of which there is a thirst and a scarcity here), armed with long battered tin-horns, that utter forth a voice, to which the combined music of an ass, a hog, and fifty magpies all blended into one rich melody were but a fool. The man wakens me every morning about seven of the clock, with a full-flowing screech, that often makes me almost tremble.

I hope you are getting into better health now when the weather is bright and invigorating. Have you ever got down to sea-bathing this summer? You should try it by all means. It is quite a specific to me; if I lived by the shore, I am almost certain I should recover completely. This last winter and spring I have had more light thrown upon your various indispositions than I ever got before. I may say I never till lately knew how to pity you as I ought. These nerves when they get deranged are the most terrific thing imaginable. I do entreat you, my dear Mother, to take the most minute and scrupulous charge of your health—for the sake of us all. No one can tell what you have endured already—take care! take care!

As to news or anything of that sort, you will find all I have to say in the boys' letters. At any rate you see, the paper is finished, and I must withdraw. Give my love to my Father and all the wee things—not forgetting Nancy if she is still with you.—I am always (my dear Mother) your affectionate Son,

THOS. CARLYLE.

LXXII.—TO ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Mainhill.

EDINBURGH, 9th August 1821.

MY DEAR ALICK—I have merely a few minutes to write you in; and my head is turning sadly during the operation—for I have been dining and gaffaing with one Nichol, a Mathematical Teacher here. But half a minute would suffice to say all my say; which is only to tell you that I design to come home forthwith, that is to say, on Monday next, the 13th of August, in the year of Grace eighteen hundred and twenty-one. I shall mount the Dumfries mail-coach about eight of the clock on that important morning: and I expect to be in Moffat (no miracle occurring to stop me) about four in the afternoon.

Therefore, my dear Alick, you will proceed instantly, on receipt of this, and attach the quadruped Dumble to the rack, giving him what corn and hay he is able to consume; that so on Monday morning that famous charger may be strengthened to undertake the journey to Moffat, and transport my carcass down to Mainhill upon his back. . . .

Within the last three weeks, I have written almost as much as I had ever written before in the whole course of my natural life. Not only my own two stipulated Articles, but another, which the very shifty Editor called upon me not to write only but to manufacture, the proper Author, one Erskine, a Laird, having fallen sick,—or gone stupid (I should say stupider), and not being able to finish what he had already begun and even got printed. It was such a job. But I have done it all now ; and spite of that wretched bog, I am merry as a maltman. They are printing it even now ; and if you but saw my table ; how it is covered with manuscripts and first copies and proof-sheets and pens and snuffers and tumblers of water and pipes of tobacco ! But no matter.

On Monday morning then, you will start about nine o'clock and meet me pointedly. If you cannot come, even Jamie would do ; but you would do better. Should circumstances prevent you, however, do not mind it : I shall wait till eleven, and then ascend the Glasgow mail—appearing, in that case, at Mainhill before duck-rising.

. . . I was going to bid you call for this letter on Saturday ; but I am a Scot and no Irishman to produce bulls ; therefore I trust to Fate that you will get the news on Sunday at farthest.

Good-night, my dear Alick ! I am amazingly sleepy—but notwithstanding always, your affectionate Brother,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LXXIII.—To Miss WELSH, Haddington.

MAINHILL, ECCLEFECHAN,

1st September 1821.

MY DEAR MADAM—On again noticing this crabbed hand of mine, I fear you are ready to exclaim with some feelings of surprise and displeasure: Why troublest thou me? To this very natural question it were tedious and difficult to make any satisfactory reply. The causes which give motion to my pen at present are too vague and complicated for being discussed in the preface to a single letter; and hardly of importance enough to a second person for being discussed anywhere. Perhaps it is more expedient, as it is certainly easier, to throw myself on your good-nature at once; to supplicate your indulgence if I prove tiresome, your forgiveness if I be so unfortunate as to offend. You know well enough it is far from my intention to do either: and cases are every day arising in which a generous person finds it just to let the innocence of the purpose serve as an excuse for the faultiness of the deed.

Upon this principle, if on no other, I entreat you, be not angry with me! If you saw into my views properly, I am sure you would not.

The truth is, in this remote district, where so few sensible objects occur to arrest my attention—while I am too sick and indolent to search for intellectual objects—the Imagination is the busiest faculty, and shadows of the past and the future are nearly all I have to occupy myself with. But in the multitude of anticipations and remembrances, it is quite conceivable that your image should be occasionally present with me; and all men love to talk or at least to write on subjects about which they often think. Nor is it merely as an absent friend that I contemplate you, and have a kind of claim to converse with you. It is impossible for me, without many peculiar emotions, to behold a being like you entering so devotedly upon the path of Letters, which I myself have found to be as full of danger as it is of beauty: and though my own progress in it bears but indifferent testimony to my qualifications as a Guide, I may be allowed to offer you the result of my experience, such as it is, and to pronounce the "Good-speed!" which I wish you in silence so frequently and so cordially.

I am not now going to depreciate your studies, or tease you with advices to abandon them. I said enough on that side of the question when we were together last; and stupidly—as native dulness, exaggerated by a sleepless week, and the fat contented presence of Mr. B. could make me say it: and after all I believe my habitual opinion is not of that sort. To me those pursuits have been the source of much disquiet; but also of some enviable enjoyment: if they have added a darker shade to the gloom of my obscure destiny, I ought not to forget that here and there they have chequered it with a ray of heavenly brightness, which seemed to make amends for all. The case is similar with every one that follows literature: it increases our sensibility to pleasure as well as pain; it enlarges the circle of objects capable of affecting us; and thus at once deepens and diversifies the happiness and the misery of our life. The latter in a higher ratio, I fear: yet here it is often blamed unjustly ; there are perturbed souls to whose unrest it gives direction rather than existence : and though the charge were altogether just, what could be made of it ? Happiness is not our final aim in this world—or poor Shandy¹ would be the finest character in the nation. It is the complete development of our faculties—the increase in capacity as sentient and thinking creatures, that constitutes the first want : and as mental excellence—to think well and feel nobly—is doubtless the highest of all attainments—so the mental nourishment which literature affords, as richly as any object of human activity, should stand among the foremost of our desires. Nourishment of any kind may, indeed, by injudicious application, be converted into poison ; and mental nourishment forms no exception to the rule. But if its abuse may lead to isolation from our brethren, and to every species of wretchedness, its prudent use does not of necessity exclude from any other source of happiness. Often, it is true, the studious man wanders in solitude over rocky and tempestuous regions; but sometimes a lovely scene will strike his eye as well as that of another, and touch him more keenly than it does another:—some sweet sequestered dale, embosomed calmly among the barren mountains of life,—so verdant and smiling and balmy—so like a home and resting-place for the wearied spirit, that even the sight of it is happiness: to reach it would be too much; would bring Eden back again into the world, and make Death to be indeed, what cowards have named him, the enemy of man. Oh that it lay with me to show you the means of securing all the benefits to be found in such pursuits, without any of the harm! But it may not be. The law of our existence is that good and evil are inseparable always: the heart that can taste of rapture must taste of torment also, and find the elements of both in all things it engages with. Nevertheless I counsel you to persevere. In your advantages natural and accidental, there exist the materials of a glorious life: and if in cultivating the gifts of your mind, you can but observe the Golden mean, which it is so easy to talk of, so difficult to find—if in striving after what is great and productive of honour, you do not too widely deviate from what is common and productive of comfort—the result will not still be unmixed, but I shall join with thousands in rejoicing at it. The hazard is great, the alternative appalling ; but I augur well.

¹ Miss Welsh's dog. See Carlyle's Miscellanies (Library Edition, v., 267, n.) for this Shandy's interviews with Sir Walter Scott !

My sheet is done while my subject is scarce begun. Shall I not have another opportunity to enter on it? I still entertain a firm trust that you are to read Schiller and Goethe with me in October. I never yet met with any to relish their beauties ; and sympathy is the very soul of life. This letter is amazingly stupid. It is enough if it recall to your memory, without displeasure, one who desires your welfare in every sense as honestly as he can desire anything.—Your sincere friend,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

LXXIV.—To Mr. R. MITCHELL (care of Mr. T. Murray, Edinburgh).

MAINHILL, 3d October 1821.

MY DEAR MITCHELL—I was down at Ruthwell the other week, and got the two books which you so punctually left for me; but as the promise recorded on the slip of paper stuck into Keill¹ seems likely to be rather tardy in its fulfilment, I am going to interrupt your repose with a reason unconnected with borrowing or lending. I owe you an apology for my unceremonious desertion of our appointment: but I suppose you have already excused me. Murray will have told you the cause of my failure; how I went into Galloway, and rode and ran in all directions there without measure. How could I withstand such an opportunity of gadding? You cannot but forgive me.

In our perambulations through “that Attica of Scotland,” the Historian and I did not fail to revisit the intended scene of your didactic labours, and to muse a little on the fruits which the Tree of Knowledge, pruned and watered by your steady hand, is likely to produce to yourself and the youth of Kirkcudbright. Our augury was favourable: and I rejoiced individually in the thought that my oldest, nearly my only, College friend had found so fair an arena for exhibiting his talents in the way most agreeable to himself, and acquiring some portion of those rewards which honest industry has the best of all rights to claim. Of the Gallovidian Capital I know nothing in particular: but I can easily predict that in commencing your functions, and even in proceeding with them regularly, you will have much to strive with, which your previous experience has made you but imperfectly aware of. Human nature is nearly the same everywhere: and the tie by which a schoolmaster is connected with his employers is at all times of so galling a kind, that there is no wonder both parties should wince under it occasionally. Busy-bodies will be forward to offer you advices, remonstrances, complaints; the completion of your ideal schemes will be marred in part (it is but the continual destiny of man!) by the ungainliness of your materials; and at first, it is likely, you may languish under the want of congenial society, and such a home as you enjoyed at Ruthwell. My own experience of these things is trifling and unfavourable; yet I do not reckon the problem of succeeding in a school, and learning to remedy or endure all its grievances, one of extreme difficulty. First, as in every undertaking, it is necessary, of course, that you wish to succeed; that you determine firmly to let nothing break your equanimity, that you “lay aside every weight”—your philosophical projects, your shyness of manner (if you are cursed with that quality), your jealous sense of independence—everything in short that circumstances may point out as detrimental to your interest with the people; and then, being thus balanced and set in motion, your sole after duty is to “run with patience:” you will reach the goal undoubtedly. Public favour in some sense is requisite for all men ; but a Teacher ought constantly to bear in mind, that it is life and breath to him : hence in comparison with it nothing should be dear to him ; he must be meek and kindly and soft of speech to every one, how absurd and offensive soever. To the same object he must also frequently sacrifice the real progress of his pupils, if it cannot be gained without affecting their peace of mind. The advantages of great learning are so vague and distant, the miseries of constant whining are so immediate and manifest, that not one parent in a thousand can take the former in exchange for the latter—with patience—not to speak of thankfulness. For the same reason he must (if the fashion of the place require it) go about and visit his employers ; he must cook them and court them by every innocent mode which the ever-varying posture of circumstances will suggest to a mind on the outlook for them. This seems poor philosophy—but it is true. The most diligent fidelity in discharging your duties will not serve you—by itself. Never forget this—it is mathematically certain. If men were angels, or even purely intellectual beings having judgment and no vanity or other passion, it might be different ; but as it is, the case becomes much more complicated—few, very few, had not rather be cheated than despised, and even in the common walks of life, probity is often left to rot without so much as being praised. It has the alget without the laudatur ;¹—which is a most sorry business doubtless.

¹ Probably Introductio ad veram Physicam. See Letter XII., supra.

I have written down all this, my dear Mitchell, not because I thought you wanted it ; on the contrary, I imagine your talents and manners and temper promise you a distinguished success ; but because I thought the fruit of my painful experience might be worth something to you, and that something, however small, I was anxious to offer you. Take it, and call it the widow's mite, if you like. It is from your friend,

T. CARLYLE.

Will you let me know where you are, and when you intend coming Southward? I must see you before you move westward: I know not when I shall go to Edinburgh. Its reek and stench are hateful to me.

¹ ——— “probitas laudatur et alget.”

JUVENAL, Sat. i. 74.

END OF VOL. I.

