

G. R. Peterson '10
406 Daniel St.
C.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

HORACE

FOR ENGLISH READERS

BEING A TRANSLATION OF THE POEMS OF QUINTUS HORATIUS FLACCUS INTO ENGLISH PROSE

BY

E. C. WICKHAM, D.D.

DEAN OF LINCOLN; HON. FELLOW OF NEW COLLEGE, OXFORD

OXFORD
AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1903

HENRY FROWDE, M.A.
PUBLISHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD
LONDON, EDINBURGH
NEW YORK

oc/4479022

Amicus
A. O. P. ptinus

Animae qualem neque candidiorem
Terra tulit, neque cui me sit devinctior alter.

PREFACE

NO Latin poet has been translated into verse, in this country at least, more often than Horace. Perhaps the long list of poets, scholars, and statesmen who from generation to generation have tried their hands at the task may suggest the reflection that part of its fascination must consist in its insuperable difficulties. The humbler part of translating him into prose has been scantily attempted in England, though the example has been set us in France. By translation into prose I understand that which has been done for Virgil by Conington and more lately by Mackail, for Homer by Lang and his coadjutors, or again in part for Dante by Dr. Carlyle—a translation which, while literal in the sense that every thought is exactly represented in its proper order, tone, and emphasis, has also just so much thinking of literary form that it can be read by a modern reader without distress, and understood without perpetual reference to the original; and that (to adapt Horace's own expression) if in the process the author be necessarily dismembered, the fragments can at least be recognized for those of a poet. Conington's prose translation of Virgil, which was published posthumously, but which had been read by him in his Professorial lectures, was perhaps the first attempt of the kind for a Latin poet. Nowadays a translation into English prose is coming to be thought as necessary to a complete edition of a classic as a translation into Latin was to a Greek classic at the beginning of the last century. That is the true parallel. English translations have come with full English commentaries. They are their natural complement; and any mischief which they may be supposed to cause to classical study—I should prefer to say, any change that they indicate in its methods—has come already with the commentaries.

Perhaps in saying so much an old schoolmaster is betraying a twinge of conscience at seeming to publish a ‘crib.’ But in truth if the present translation owed its origin to an Oxford lecture-room some thirty years ago, it has been given to the printer now not so much with any view to schoolboys or Academic students as to two other classes of readers. Horace was more read in the generation which is passing away than he is now; and it has been thought that some who, though their classical books are not often disturbed, have not altogether lost the memory of his genial wisdom may turn over these pages with interest and find in them some echoes of the past. And there is an increasing class of persons who, without first-hand knowledge of the classical languages, are interested to make the great writers of Greece and Rome something more than mere names to themselves. Perhaps these will care more to feel that they have the exact things which Horace said than to have a distant and questionable imitation of the poetical form in which he said it. Even in plain prose, it may be, they will find some charm in his company, and feel across the centuries the ‘touch of nature.’

LINCOLN, June 1903.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION: HORACE'S LIFE AND WRITINGS	I
TABLE OF PROBABLE DATES OF HORACE'S LIFE AND WORKS	23
ODES:—
BOOK I	25
II	60
III	79
IV	114
THE SECULAR HYMN	134
EPODES	137
SATIRES:—
BOOK I	158
II	204
EPISTLES:—
BOOK I	261
II	316
THE ART OF POETRY	340

INTRODUCTION

HORACE'S LIFE AND WRITINGS

WE have always been more chary than some other peoples in naturalizing the classical writers. Even among the more commonly read Latin

ERRATA

- Page 69, l. 5, after with insert the
,, 145, l. 28, for me read one
,, 266, l. 7, unevenly should be read for evenly
,, 335, l. 7, after of should be inserted a
,, 341, l. 12, for features read feathers
,, 343, note 3, the reference should be 335, not 333

Horace, Translation

than against the poet, wrote :

Now farewell, Horace, whom I hated so,
Not for thy faults, but mine !

And he has been the favourite of as many generations. The poet Persius, some fifty years after his death, describes him as a Satirist : ‘ Horace has a knack

INTRODUCTION

HORACE'S LIFE AND WRITINGS

†

WE have always been more chary than some other peoples in naturalizing the classical writers. Even among the more commonly read Latin classics we make a selection. We write Horace and Virgil (unless we prefer Vergil) and Ovid, but Propertius and Lucretius, Terence but Plautus, Livy but Tacitus.

We indicate in this way our favourites, those who seem most at home among us, perhaps those whose writings have been most continuously used as school-books. Horace has both claims to be treated as an old friend. He and Virgil have shared the place of the universal school-books from the days when Juvenal, not a hundred years after their death, wrote of a class of Roman schoolboys with their 'thumbed Horace and Virgil as black as soot,' to the day when Byron, in a fit of half-humorous spleen against his schoolmasters rather than against the poet, wrote :

Now farewell, Horace, whom I hated so,
Not for thy faults, but mine !

And he has been the favourite of as many generations. The poet Persius, some fifty years after his death, describes him as a Satirist : ' Horace has a knack of putting his finger on every flaw, yet leaving the reader smiling and his friend: every heart opens to him, and he plays about its strings.' One of the most recent of English writers on Latin literature gives a list, not exhaustive but representative, of the great men of letters in different ages and countries to whom he has been a friend and companion: 'He has forged a link of union between intellects and temperaments so diverse as those of Dante, Montaigne, Bossuet, Lafontaine, Voltaire, Hooker, Chesterfield, Gibbon, Wordsworth, Thackeray. Mystic and atheist, preacher and scoffer, recluse and leader of fashion have in Horace one subject in which they are sympathetic with each other.' Professor Tyrrell's list reminds us of one point about Horace's popularity; though it has been as wide as the world of European civilization, he has found a special home in the hearts of Frenchmen and Englishmen.

What we know of him we know almost entirely from his own writings. A few facts are added by a short memoir written, it seems, originally by Suetonius, the biographer of the twelve Caesars, but which has only reached us in a fragmentary state, and mixed up with passages which evidently refer to a totally different person. But Horace's poems are full of autobiographical matter. Though the opposite of what we call an 'egotist,' he tells us incidentally a great deal about himself, of his parentage and early home, of the events of his life, of his friends, his haunts, his daily occupations in Rome and in the country, and (if we are careful to read between the lines) of his personal tastes and character.

He was born on December 8, sixty-five years before the Christian Era, two years before Augustus Caesar. It was the year of Catiline's first abortive conspiracy. Pompey was in Asia winning military renown and the attachment of the army in the war against king Mithridates. Julius Caesar was in Rome serving the office of Aedile, and ingratiating himself with the populace by his magnificent expenditure on public buildings and shows of games. It was a moment of pause in the civil wars ; but everything was preparing, both in respect of conditions and of persons, for the great impending struggle and political resettlement, the issues of which were so largely to affect Horace's life.

Like most of the great Roman writers, he was country-born. His father belonged to Venusia, a town which lay on the Eastern slope of the Apennines, among a network of valleys which run down from Monte Voltore, an extinct volcano, carrying their waters into the Aufidus or Ofanto, the largest of the torrents that cross the Apulian plain to the Adriatic. Horace's poetry has many references to the scenery and associations of his early home. There is the well-known story of his childhood, how (no doubt when he was in villeggiatura, perhaps at his nurse's cottage in the hills, for Mount Vultur was ten miles from Venusia) he lost himself in the forest and was found, like the babes in the wood, covered up with leaves by the wood-pigeons. We find in his verses the names which still exist of villages and forests near. In one of the Satires, when describing a journey over the Apennines with Maecenas, he notes with delight the place from which he caught the first sight of the familiar outlines of his Apulian hills. It seems an unconscious and therefore more touching tribute to his fondness, that when he is speaking of the richness of Italian soil, the valour of Italian soldiers, the sturdy industry of Italian peasants, where others would have used the epithet 'Roman' or 'Italian,' he slips frequently into 'Apulian,' or what is its equivalent, 'Daunian.'

Venusia was a 'colony': that is, it was originally a frontier town, an outpost planted in a conquered country, where veteran soldiers were settled and a miniature Rome created. It was founded in B.C. 291, near the end of the last Samnite war. Horace makes in Sat. 1.10 an interesting use of this position of Venusia. He is defending himself for writing Satire, and he says that he is as the Venusian settlers in old days, set on the border, of a fighting stock, ready to do battle with any one who assails the territory which he has undertaken to guard. In other words his Satire is one of defence, not of defiance. He writes not to wound or injure, but to protect the sacred interests of virtue, good sense, and patriotism.

Whether this means that Horace claimed descent in any way from the colonists of Venusia does not appear. If so, his family had come down in the world, for his father had been a slave. He had obtained his freedom in some way before his marriage, for Horace himself was ingenuus, born, that is, of parents free at the time of his birth. But still the 'freedman's son' was in a social position which exposed him by-and-by, when he began to rise in the world, to jealousy and taunts which he felt keenly. He lived through them; and when the completion of his volume of lyric poetry (Odes i-iii) had given him full self-confidence, we find him actually making it a boast that like Daunus, the mythical founder of the Apulian race, 'ex humili potens,' he too had risen from humility to greatness; as he puts it in another place, that 'born of a freedman sire and in a modest home he had spread wings too wide for his nest, so that anything you took from his birth you must add to his merit.' But to be magnanimous when success is assured is easy. What strikes us in Horace is the way in which he met the criticism when he still felt it, at the time that he was writing his first book. I refer of course especially to the passage in Sat. I. 6, in which, after speaking of the taunts against his birth, which had pursued him from the first, but especially since he became the friend of Maecenas, he first explains the history of their friendship, in order to show that he owed it neither to chance nor to any base arts, but to his own personal qualities, and then turning the tables on his detractors he avows that any merit which may have been found in him was due to the parentage on which they poured scorn. He describes his father's anxious and tender care for him, how though his means were small he had spared nothing to give his son the best possible education, had brought him to Rome instead of sending him to a country school, as men richer and grander than he did, had taken care that his boy should never lack what others had in the way of dress and attendance, but had delegated to no one the duty of guarding him from the dangers and temptations of a great city, had gone himself with him daily to and from school. This is his conclusion (I give it in Conington's version):

He feared not lest one day
The world should talk of money thrown away,
If after all I plied some trade for hire
Like him, a tax collector or a crier:
Nor had I murmured: as it is, the score
Of gratitude and praise is all the more.
No! while my head's unturned, I ne'er shall need
To blush for that dear father, or to plead,
As men oft plead, 'tis Nature's fault, not mine.
I came not of a better, worthier, line.
Not thus I speak, not thus I feel: the plea Might serve another, but 'twere base in me.
Should Fate this moment bid me to go back
O'er all my length of years, my life retrack
To its first hour, and pick out such descent
As man might wish for, e'en to pride's content.
I should rest satisfied with mine, nor choose
New parents, decked with senatorial shoes.

A nobler tribute has seldom been paid to a father.

Horace tells us nothing of his mother, nor of any brother or sister, and this probably means that he was an only child, left early on his father's hands. The father had made, it seems, a little money; how, we know not. Horace speaks of him as having been a 'coactor,' and the author of the Suetonian life adds 'exactionum,' a 'collector' of debts or dues, either in the way of ordinary business or of revenue. The latter authority says further that he dealt in salted goods. He had retired and bought a small farm. He saw no doubt his boy's unusual gifts and carried him off to give him every chance of a refined education at Rome. He had married, probably, as was said, after he obtained his freedom, that is, rather late in life, and it would seem likely that he died before his son attained eminence.

Besides the account to which reference has been made we have a few scattered hints as to Horace's education. We know the name of his schoolmaster, and Horace adds an epithet which will stick to him to the end of time—'Orbilius plagosus,' fond of the rod. But as we know from other sources, he was a scholar and schoolmaster of note; and since he came from Beneventum, on the road from Venusia to Rome, Horace's father would probably have heard of his reputation. We cannot but sympathize with him, poor Orbilius! His great pupil called him 'plagosus,' and a short biography of him which exists tells us that he 'taught with more reputation than remuneration,' and that he wrote a book on 'the wrongs which schoolmasters suffer at the hands of parents.' Horace tells us that one of his earliest school-books was a Latin translation by Livius Andronicus of Homer's Odyssey. When school was over, a young Roman who was to finish his education went, much as we go to a university, to Athens, with the view chiefly of listening to the lectures of the philosophers who still made that city their head quarters. Horace's 'university life' made its mark on him in two ways. The interest in philosophy as it was then chiefly understood—moral philosophy, that is—the ends of moral action and the practical conduct of life—he never lost. It is the subject to which in all his writings he returns. He could never bind himself to any single school: he was, as he describes himself, a wanderer on the sea, putting in now to one haven and now another, as wind and wave carried him; fingering the philosophers' problems always with some interest, though playfully, pointing out their paradoxes, pressing home their serious lessons. But his sojourn had another result. He was at Athens in the fatal year of Caesar's assassination, and Brutus, soon after the 'Ides of March,' came there also, and for the moment was keeping quiet, professing to study philosophy and frequenting the lectures of Theomnestus the Academic. It was a moment to stir a young poet's blood. We think of our own Coleridge and Southey and Wordsworth in the first fervour of the French Revolution. And Brutus, the student and idealist, was the man to attract his sympathy and dominate his imagination. The two came together, and when in a few weeks Brutus departed to his Province, he took Horace with him on his staff, and eventually (it suggests that the Republican army was not very well officered) gave him the command of a 'cohort' or battalion. And so Horace came to fight on the side of Brutus and Cassius against his future patron and friend in the disastrous battle of Philippi. Every one knows the story of his throwing away his shield in the rout, but it is not always remembered on what authority the story rests. It is on a few words of his own, and these, as evidently as anything that was ever written, not to be taken with prosaic literalness. When he is writing seriously at the end of the first book of the Epistles he claims that it should be remembered of him that both at home and in the field he had found favour in the eyes of the first men of Rome. We may be quite sure that if he had misbehaved at Philippi he would not have touched the question. It was the confidence that his readers knew better that enabled him in this way to impute cowardice to himself. On the one hand it is said playfully. Alcaeus, the Greek lyric poet (and he is always desiring to be thought the Roman Alcaeus), had sung (also, probably, in irony) of himself that in a famous battle he had flung away his shield. Horace says in effect 'I played the poet's part—you know what that has always been.' On the other hand it is part (if we read the whole Ode and try to estimate its core of meaning) of a generous tribute to a lost cause. Horace is addressing a friend who in that campaign had been his close companion, and who, when Horace gave up the contest and came home, had gone on fighting, but who now to his friend's surprise and delight has appeared in Rome safe and unmolested by the new government. 'What, Pompeius,' he says, 'at home again safe in limb and rights? Pompeius who shared with me the dangers and snatched pleasures of the campaign under Brutus!’ Then comes the stanza in question: ‘We were together when I felt the shock of Philippi and the headlong rout, my poor little shield ingloriously left behind me, what time Virtue broke and those who threatened high bit the dust in defeat.’ His own part is purposely made little of. It was a fit part for a poet—and who was he when Virtue herself was broken? The words are few, but the more weighty for that. There is reference to the story that Brutus when the battle was over fell, broken-hearted, on his own sword, expressing his despair in a quotation from a Greek poet, ‘Poor Virtue! so thou art a name: but I took thee for a reality and set my life to follow thee.’ It has been worth while to dwell on this point at length, for two conclusions may be drawn from the review: (1) It is an illustration of the independence and dignity which Horace maintained in his great change of political position. Having fought by the side of the murderers of the first Caesar, he became the apologist and eventually the court-poet and the intimate friend of the second. It was a difficult transition to make without the sacrifice of principle or self-respect, but he so made it. He was not a politician, but a poet. He felt deeply the horror of civil wars, with their aimless bloodshed and the impotence abroad which they entailed. He felt also the moral defects of the Roman people, the luxury, the loss of discipline, the decline of patriotism, which were at the root of their political troubles. In a moment of enthusiasm he had thought that in the enterprise of Brutus and Cassius he saw the way back to the better social and political ideals of the past. Events destroyed the illusion, and he came, not at once, but by stages which we can trace, to see that the best hope of the reforms which he desired lay in the acceptance of the rule of Octavianus. He gave his adhesion to him and put his muse at his service, but he was not expected to bespatter his old friends. He was not a prophet, but his enthusiasm was for what was great and promising in the imperial government. It was not for power or splendour of the court, but for the social and moral reforms promised and sought, for the return of peace and stability, the restoration of religion, the rule of moderation, culture, and refinement. (2) Secondly, it is an illustration of the necessity, when we would understand Horace from his writings, of making full allowance for the playfulness and irony with which he always speaks of himself. He never makes the best of himself. He never would have us think him too much in earnest. It is always 'Who am I to preach? I am no saint. I am as bad as my neighbours.'

It is the same spirit in which he so often begins or ends his great political and patriotic Odes with apology for meddling in such high matters, with profession, obviously untrue, that his real interest and poetic gift lie in concerns of love and wine. It is the explanation of several things in his writings which we should gladly miss in them.

The immediate results of Philippi were disastrous to him. He came home, as he says, 'humbled and with his wings clipped.' He found his Venusian estate forfeited in the proscription which followed the defeat. His father, it would seem, was dead. But he had made friends, and he was pardoned, and what we should call a clerkship in the Treasury was procured for him; and so we find him started on life in Rome. At some time, probably during his schooldays, he had made the acquaintance of the poet Virgil, who was five years older than himself, and they became warm friends. Through him he was introduced to Maecenas, the powerful minister and munificent patron of literature; and then, in the modest sense in which he sought fortune, his fortune was made. We hear no more of the clerkship, save that we find his fellow clerks once or twice claiming the help of their former colleague. Maecenas gave him a small country house and farm among the Sabine hills, some twenty-eight miles from Rome and ten from Tivoli. The exact position of the house is still doubtful, but the valley and all the points on which he dwells so fondly, the spring, the stream, the hills, the site of a temple then in ruins, the village high on the opposite hill, the market-town three miles down the valley at its junction with the valley of the Anio, can all be identified and are the objects of frequent pilgrimage. This was his delightful and beloved home for much of his time henceforth. He spent part of the year, but a diminishing part, in Rome (he says that he came with the first swallow and left before the first fig), and as he got older, the winter months at some warm seaside place. At one time his favourite place was Tarentum, at another time he frequently went to Baiae, on the coast a few miles north of Naples. One year his physician, the famous Antonius Musa, who was the inventor and a great upholder of the cold water cure, forbade him Baiae where the treatment was sulphur vapour baths; and he writes a poetical letter to a friend to ask him about the watering places further down on the gulf of Paestum.

We have many glimpses of Horace's mode of life in his Sabine retreat. The estate was a small one, but there was room on it for a small home farm, managed and tilled by a bailiff and eight other slaves, and also for five small holdings let to tenants. We see Horace walking about his little property, talking to his bailiff about the possibility of growing vines in one warm corner (the bailiff says they may as well try to grow pepper or frankincense) or as to the necessity of banking the stream. We see him plying a mattock or moving stones with his own hands to the amusement of his neighbours. We see him strolling in the forest, his mind full of some stanza of an Ode which he is composing, and forgetting how far he is from home till suddenly a huge wolf confronts him, yet such is a good conscience that the poet is less frightened than the wolf. He tells us of his building plans. He tells us of the books he brought with him when he came out for a short holiday from Rome. He tells us of his happy evenings with chosen friends and some honest neighbours, of their simple suppers which the home-bred slaves share after them, of their freedom from the foolish rules of deep drinking which made town banquets odious to him, of their talk, not as in town on frivolous topics, about their neighbours' affairs or the merits of a popular actor, but of that 'which comes nearer home to us and on which it is a misfortune to be ignorant,' whether happiness is to be found in wealth or in virtue, what is the true ground of friendship, what is the highest good.

In the same way he tells us how he spent a day in Rome. He was awake by daybreak, but moved to his sofa and read or wrote undisturbed for three hours; then he took a stroll in the town (one such stroll and all its incidents he has preserved for us), or else he went to the Campus Martius and played with Maecenas what he calls the 'game of three,' apparently a game of ball. When the sun grew hot, perhaps between ten and eleven, he went in and took his first meal, a light luncheon, 'just enough,' he says, 'to save him from going all day without food.' As the afternoon came on he went out again, looked into shops and asked how prices were, strolled about the Circus and the Forum, stopped to listen to the fortune-tellers who haunted them, amused himself, in fact, with the humours of the town, and so came home again to his frugal supper of vegetables and maccaroni. This was a quiet day; but the picture is given from his earlier years in Rome as a man of letters, when he had less position and fewer acquaintances than he had later. There were many distractions also, which he disliked increasingly, and of course he did not always sup at home. He was frequently at Maecenas's great house on the Esquiline; and Maecenas's friendship and the company of literary men whom he met there were his great attraction to Rome. But as soon as he had his country house he called it his 'arx,' his stronghold of refuge, and fled to it as often and as early as he could.

Through Maecenas he became known to Augustus, and the Emperor made an effort to persuade him to live with him and act as his private secretary. He had the courage and good sense to refuse, and it is to Augustus's credit that he did not resent it but treated him as a friend to the end of his life. Some fragments are preserved of letters from Augustus to him, both playful and affectionate.

Horace was a man of delicate health. He had always, as we say, to 'take care of himself.' In spite of the bacchanalian tone of a few of his Odes it is clear that he was temperate in the use of wine. His first two questions about a place proposed for his sojourn are 'what is the bread like?' and 'what is the water like?' He seems ordinarily to have eaten sparingly. He was unmarried, although he was an ardent upholder of Augustus's legislation to encourage marriage.

People who look at the headings of his Odes run away with the idea that he was always in love with some fresh young lady and that he treated some of them very badly. Some ingenious critics have gone the length of writing a life of him from this point of view; but it all means a misunderstanding of his poetry and its relation to his life. Horace's love poetry is not like that of some other Latin poets, Catullus for instance, the outpouring of the stress and passion of youth. It is the conscious and artistic work of a man between thirty-five and forty-two. These are pretty certainly the limits of the commencement and conclusion of his chief volume of lyric poetry. It may be true that, even with a lyric poet of this type, each poem had some starting-point, but the occasion may be the slightest. He versifies not his own experience only, but that of others. A remark made at a supper-party, an incident narrated to him, a casual image in conversation or in a book, are enough to set his fancy working, and the result is a dramatic sketch of the situation or feeling suggested. This may be held to deduct from the interest of his poetry, but at least it must be remembered before he is supposed to plead guilty to crimes against love and good feeling.

In the year 17 B.C., when Horace was forty-seven, an event happened which made a certain change in his position. He became, to use a modern phrase, 'poet-laureate.' Amongst many antiquarian and religious revivals, Augustus determined, on the renewal to himself, in that year, of the imperial power (which at first he had only accepted for ten years), to celebrate with great magnificence the so-called Secular games, of which though there is little actual record there was a tradition linking them with the fortunes of the Roman State, and suggesting that they should be performed once in a saeculum, a period variously estimated at 100 and 110 years. By way of giving éclat to them and of drawing attention to the distinction of his reign as the greatest literary epoch in Roman history, he wished a special Ode to be written for the occasion and sung at the performance, and he chose Horace to do this. This selection gave the poet a public and, as it were, official position which he had not before, and it was followed a few years later by a pressing invitation to write (as a poet-laureate might be expected to write) two Odes to celebrate the victories of the two imperial princes, the stepsons of the Emperor, Tiberius and Drusus. This led to the preparation of a fourth book of Odes, although he had then for ten years laid aside lyric composition. We are now in the year 13, and his life was drawing to a close. Some years before he had addressed an Ode to Maecenas, who was himself an invalid and nervous about himself, in which, partly in playful remonstrance and partly in seriousness of feeling, he protested that if Maecenas died he should die also. So in effect it happened. They died in the year B.C. 8 within a few weeks of one another, Maecenas first, Horace on November 27, when he was within a few days of his fifty-seventh birthday. His ashes were laid close to those of his friend on the Esquiline hill.

Horace's writings follow two streams. There are his lyrical poems, and there are what he himself calls his 'talks' or prose poems, the Satires and Epistles. Though the form of the two is so different, the man is the same behind both, and to a very great extent the subjects that interest him and call for expression are the same, and in both cases there is a process of development to be traced of the same kind and in the same direction. He describes in one place¹, making an anecdote serve as a parable, with some irony and exaggeration, no doubt, but with some substantial truth, the motives and temper of his earliest writings. It must be true that, when he came home from Philippi to find himself homeless and without an income, he felt out of temper with himself and the world; and it is true that his first literary efforts were of the nature of invective. But if he wrote in the first instance coarsely and bitterly, and two or three very disagreeable poems which remain look as if he did, his good taste and feeling made him destroy nearly all of such work. The little collection of poems which we call Epodes, though in their original idea personality and sting belong to their essence, yet soften and generalize till they are hard to distinguish from the later Lyrics which we call Odes. And Satire in the same way softens and humanizes in his hands, so that when we pass from the so-called 'Satires' to the mellow and beautiful 'Epistles' we hardly feel that the character of the poetry is changed.

The Epodes (17) represent all that he left to posterity of his lyrical work between the years 41, when he returned to Rome, and 31, the year of Actium. One of the poems is of great historical interest, for if the interpretation now generally given to it is right, it is the only contemporaneous record of that great battle. It was written, it is suggested with high probability, on board Maecenas's galley at some time on the day of the engagement. It ends with a humorous picture of Horace's own division of mind between the battle and his own personal feelings of sea-sickness. No picture so vivid has survived of the terror, scorn, and loathing which had been excited in the minds of patriotic Romans by the dread of Mark Antony's success in this battle, meaning, as it would have meant, the appearance in Rome of the barbarian queen, Cleopatra, the introduction of feminine rule, and of the degrading accessories of an Oriental court. This feeling went far with Horace, and doubtless with many others, as it became clear that Rome had only a choice of masters, to determine him to the warm support of Octavianus.

¹ See Epist. 2. 2.

It was in writing the Epodes that Horace learned that he had a lyrical gift. As they occupied the years from 41 to 31, so the first three books of the Odes, which form a unity, occupied the years from 30 to 23. It is easy to feel the charm of the Odes, and yet the difficulty of assigning them their proper place in poetry. They are lyrical, yet there is not in them what has been called the 'lyrical cry'; there is not passion nor profundity of thought or of feeling. They 'rise sometimes,' as a Latin critic said of them, to considerable force and dignity, especially in dealing with themes of patriotism; but on the whole they are playful, ironical, commonplace in topics, exquisite in form rather than in substance. Yet they are no mere 'verses of society.' They travel from land to land and from age to age, and are always at home. There is no collection of poems which has been so frequently quoted: and this is because there is none which has given such perfect expression to the elementary experiences and universal sentiments of the general readers of literature. The shortness of life, the mutability of fortune, the delights of friendship, the pleasures of ease, mirth, jollity, and wine, the lighter and superficial aspect of love, its caprices, jealousies, quarrels, and reconciliations, the rudimentary lessons of practical philosophy, patience, contentment, moderation; these are all touched again and again in phrases which catch the sense with their music and dwell in the memory from their terseness, simplicity, and happiness. If the poetry of the Odes is the poetry of art rather than of nature, it is art that has proved inimitable. When Horace ceased to write, 'the mould was broken'¹.

To turn to the other class of his poetry. The first collection of poems that he published is the First Book of the Satires, which he gave to the world some four years before the Epodes. The term Satire has had a curious history. By its derivation and in its first use it meant a hotchpot—a dish of many ingredients; and was applied in literature to a medley, a collection of essays in verse on various subjects. In the hands of Lucilius it acquired from the special use he made of it the sense which we now give to it, viz. the censorious criticism of men and manners. In this sense Horace inherited it, and his first essays were in this vein: but for Satire of this kind (the Satire of Juvenal or of Pope, though Pope calls his Satires 'Imitations of Horace') Horace had too much good nature and too little self-confidence. Satire softens in his hands. It returns to something more like its original meaning. Of the fact that this had happened he showed his consciousness by dropping the word and giving his writing another name which we have never adopted in his sense. He calls these poems (and indeed apparently the Epistles also) 'Sermones,' a word which had several colours on it. It meant that they were something between poetry and prose. He calls the Muse that inspired them 'Musa pedestris,' she went 'afoot,' without the wings of poetic flight. But it had the more definite sense of 'talks,' 'causeries.' They were imitations of conversation, on men and things, on the art of living, on conduct and character, on the weaknesses of mankind, but also on other things, on literary topics, on himself, incidents of his life, his relations to Maecenas. When we pass to the Epistles little has been altered. There is the form of an Epistle; even that sometimes is nominal; but the subjects are the same, the folly of avarice, the wisdom of enjoying instead of wishing, the charms of country life and modest tastes, the paradoxes of philosophers. The style is the same, the free and unrheterical style of the best conversation, playful and serious by turns. In some ways they are an advance on the Satires. Horace is older; his position is more recognized; his views of life are wider and more mature. One point we cannot but notice with pleasure: there is not a line in them which we would wish to blot.

¹ H. A. J. Munro.

The Epistles fall into two divisions. The first Book occupies the space from the publication of the three Books of the Odes to the year B.C. 19, his own forty-sixth year. There are three more Epistles of greater length and later date; these last are all on literary subjects, the Epistle to Augustus and the Epistle to the Pisos (often called the Art of Poetry) being in substance expositions of Horace's views on poetry. These views fall mainly under two principles. First he defends the Classical School of Roman poetry, of which Virgil and he himself are to us the great representatives, against those who unduly cried up the rougher poets of earlier time, and also against the more affected poetry (of which no specimens have come down to us) which in his own day was becoming popular. And secondly he insists upon the doctrine, not unconnected with that estimate, that poetry is a serious art, requiring like other arts not merely natural gift but also long preparation and practice. One of the most often quoted of his lines tells us that though there are some things in which the moderate and the tolerable are rightly allowed their place, poetry is not one of them.

TABLE OF PROBABLE DATES

B. C.

- 65 Birth of Horace. ✓
- 44 Horace at Athens.
- 43, 42 Campaign with Brutus. Learn
- 41 Return to Rome.
- 38 Introduction to Maecenas.
- To 35 Composition of Satires, Book I.
- To 30 Satires, Book II, and the Epodes.
- To 23 Odes, Books I-III.
- To 20 or 19 Epistles, Book I.
- 19 Epistles, Book II. 2 (to Florus).
- 17 The Secular Hymn.
- 17-13 Odes, Book IV.
- 13 Epistles, Book II. 1 (to Augustus).
- 8 Death of Horace. ✓

The Art of Poetry is of less certain date. It is placed either within the same period as Epistles, Book I, viz. B.C. 23-19, or more probably in the last years of Horace's life, B. C. 10-8.

ODES

BOOK I

21

Maecenas atavis

An apology for the composition of Lyric poetry as one of the very many tastes and ambitions of mankind, and not the least happy and honourable of them. It is written as a prologue to the first three Books of the Odes, and (like the first of the Epodes, of the Satires, and of the Epistles) it is addressed to Maecenas, and so serves as a dedication.

MAECENAS, in lineage the child of kings, but oh! to me my protector, pride, and joy, there are whose pleasure it is to have raised a cloud of dust in the racecourse at Olympia, whom the pillar just cleared by the glowing wheels and the palm-branch of glory lift to the gods, the lords of earth. One is happy if the fickle crowd of Roman citizens rush to the poll to raise him through the triple grade of honours¹: another if he have housed in his own granary all that is swept from Libyan threshing-floors². The man whose joy it is to dig the stiff soil of his paternal farm, never with the offers of an Attalus³ would you tempt away from it to plough the sea round Myrto in a bark of Cyprus, a frightened sailor. The trader with the fear before his eyes of the wind of Africa wrestling with rough Icarian waters, praises a quiet homestead near his native town:

¹ Aedile, praetor, consul.

² A hyperbolical expression for having a large property in the corn-growing districts of North Africa.

³ The Attali were kings of Pergamus, of fabulous wealth.

et ipse full soon he is repairing his shattered bark; for to be content without wealth he finds too hard a lesson. There is who scorns not cups of old Massic and to filch a part from the unbroken day, stretched at length now beneath a leafy arbutus, now near the lullaby of some haunted spring. canis Many there are who love the camp and the trumpet-tones mingling with the clarion, and the wars which mothers abhor. The hunter bivouacs under Jove's cold sky without a thought of his young wife, if either his trusty hounds have sighted a deer, or a Marsian boar has broken through the meshes of close-twisted cord. For me, the ivy crown which rewards the poet's brow admits me to the company of gods; cool grove and light dances of Nymphs and Satyrs draw me aside from the throng of men, provided that neither Euterpe forbids the pipe nor Polyhymnia refuses to string the lute of Lesbos. But if you will give me a place among the bards of the lyre, I shall lift my head till it strikes the stars.

7 II

Iam satis terris

Horace has thought over the portents which followed the death of Julius Caesar, and the fruitless horrors of the civil war; and he welcomes Octavianus (the 'Caesar' of the last line) as the restorer both of peace and the arts of civil life, and also of military prestige abroad.

ENOUGH now of snow and direful hail hath the Father showered upon earth, and smiting with the bolt from his red right hand temple and tower hath struck panic into Rome. hath struck panic into the nations, lest there were coming again the age of Pyrrha¹, who complained² of portents never seen before, what time Proteus³ drove all his herd to visit the mountain summits and the kind of fishes⁴ was entangled in the elm-tops where had been the haunt and home of wood-pigeons, and frightened deer swam on the flooding waters. We have seen yellow Tiber, his stream flung forcibly back at the coast of the Tuscan sea⁵, go forth to lay low the king's monument⁶ and Vesta's shrine, while he boasts himself the avenger of Ilia's⁷ importunate complaints, and over his left bank sweeps far and wide, beyond Jove's will, the uxorious river. How for civil strife men sharpened swords by which the hateful Persian might more fitly die—how they fought—shall be told to a young generation scant in number for their parents' crimes. Whom of the gods shall our people invoke to save a toppling empire? With what prayers shall the consecrated maidens importune Vesta, who turns a deaf ear to their litanies? To whom will Jove assign the part of atoning for our guilt? Come now, at last, we pray thee, thy sun-bright shoulders veiled in clouds. Apollo, god of augury. Or thou, if thou wilt rather,

¹ With her husband Deucalion, survivor in the Greek legend of the deluge. ² It implies 'just as we are now doing.'

³ The sea-god with his seals.

⁴ 'The total kind of birds.' Milton.

⁵ Or 'from his Tuscan [right] bank.'

⁶ The 'Regia' connected in story with King Numa, and in use the residence of the 'Pontifex maximus,' and so of Julius Caesar.

⁷ Horace, following one form of the legend, identifies her with Rhea Silvia, the mother of Romulus, and also connects her name with the Julian house.

laughing Queen of Eryx, round whom hover Mirth and Love. Or if thou hast aught of care for thy neglected race, thy son's sons, thou our Sire, sated by the sport—more ah! too long—thou who joyest in the war-cry and the polished helms and the fierce glare of the Moorish foot-Mercury man on his bleeding foe. Or thou, sweet Maia's winged child¹, if it be thou that wearest upon earth the disguise of human youth, submitting to be called the avenger of a Caesar; long be it before thou returnest to heaven: and many a year mayst thou linger well pleased among the people of Quirinus; nor ever, impatient of our crimes, may any air waft thee from us all too soon! Here rather mayst thou learn to love glorious triumphs, here to be called our father and first citizen; nor let the Mede ride the foray unpunished, while thou art our leader, Caesar²!

III

Sic te diva potens

Addressed to a ship in which Virgil is crossing to Greece.

It is a playful tirade against sea-travelling, the point of which is the poet's hope that Virgil's voyage may be safely performed. Compare Epod. 10 on the voyage of a bad poet.

7 SO guide thee the goddessqueen of Cyprus; so Helen's brethren, stars of light, and the sire of the winds, keeping in the prison all save Iapyx³, O ship, that hast in charge Virgil entrusted to thy faith, restore him unharmed, I pray, to the Attic shore, and save the half of my own life.) His heart was mailed in oak and triple brass who was the first to commit a frail bark to the rough seas, and to brave a squall from Africa when it was battling to the death with north winds, and the weeping rain-stars, and the south wind's ire, than whom none more lords it over Hadria, whether it be his pleasure to lift the waves or to lay them. In what degree did he fear death, who saw with dry eyes the monsters of the deep and the troubled sea and those rocks of evil name, the Thunder Cape¹? In vain hath God in his wisdom severed land from land by the estranging² ocean, if yet in impious defiance ships bound across the forbidden waters. In its boldness to bear and to dare all things, the race of man rushes headlong into sin, despite of law. In his boldness Iapetus' son³ brought fire, a theft of woe, into the world. In the train of fire, filched from its heavenly home, wasting sickness and a strange horde of fevers swooped down on all lands, and the doom, slow though sure, of death, remote before, quickened its pace. Daedalus essayed the void air on wings which nature gave not to man. The barrier of Acheron was broken through: 'twas a labour of Hercules. No height is too arduous for mortal men. To Heaven's own gate we would climb in our folly, nor by our crimes allow Jove to lay aside the bolts of his wrath.

¹ Octavianus is identified finally with Mercury, the god of persuasion and of civil arts.

² Notice the art which keeps the name of the saviour of society to be the last word.

³ The wind which blowing from the Iapygian promontory would carry the ship across from Brundisium to Dyrrhachium.

¹ 'Thunder Cape,' Macaulay. Acroceraunia is a headland on the coast of Epirus.

² 'The unplumbed, salt, estranging sea.' M. Arnold.

³ Prometheus.

IV

Solvitur acris hiems

*Lessons of Epicureanism drawn from the spring-time.
Addressed to Sestius, consul in B. C. 23, an old comrade of Horace in the army of Brutus.*

WINTER'S sharp chain is loosening before the pleasant succession of spring-time and the west wind, and the rollers are drawing to the sea the keels long high and dry. No longer do cattle find pleasure in their stalls or ploughman in his fireside: no longer do meadows glisten white with hoar-frost. Now Venus, Cythera's queen, leads the dances when the moon is high overhead, and the fair Graces hand in hand with Nymphs shake the ground with rhythmic feet, while Vulcan glowing in the blaze visits his ponderous Cyclops' forges¹. Now it beseems us to make our brows shine and bind them with myrtle or with the flowers which the loosened earth offers. Now too in shady grove it beseems to do sacrifice to Faunus with a lamb, if so he wills it, or a kid. Pale death with impartial foot knocks at the doors of poor men's hovels and of king's palaces. O Sestius, Fortune's favourite, life's short span forbids us to enter on far-reaching hopes. In a moment night will be upon you, and the shadow-world that men talk of, and the unsubstantial house of Pluto. From the day that you come thither, you shall never again throw dice for the royalty of the banquet, nor cast eyes on fair young Lycidas.

¹ This is a mythological way of saying that the amusements and the work of life begin again.

V

Quis multa gracilisPyrrha's inconstancy.

WHAT delicate stripling is it, Pyrrha, that now, steeped in liquid perfumes, is wooing thee on the heaped rose-leaves in some pleasant grot? For whose eyes dost thou braid those flaxen locks, so trim, so simple? Ah! how often shall he weep for changed faith and changed gods, and stare in wonder at the waters roughening beneath black squalls, all new to the sight—he that now enjoys thee all golden, the credulous boy! who dreams of thee as ever free, ever amiable, little thinking how soon the wind may shift. Poor souls, to whom thy charms are an untried sea! For me, the temple's wall with its votive picture shows that I have hung up ere this my dripping garments an offering to the god who rules the waters.

VI

Scriberis Vario

An answer to a request of M. Vipsanius Agrippa that Horace would write of his exploits. 'Heroic deeds need a Homer to sing of them,' says Horace, and so in refusing gives the panegyric asked for.

THEY shall be told—for Varius is a bird of Maeonian¹ song—your bravery and your victories, every exploit which your bold soldiery achieved on shipboard or on horseback with you to lead them. I, Agrippa, and such as I, essay no more to tell such tales than to tell of the deadly wrath of Peleus' son, who knew not how to yield, or the wandering over seas of Ulysses, the man of wiles, or the bloody house of Pelops, themes too great for our humility, whilst modesty and the Muse that owns an unwarlike lyre forbid us by the failings of our own wit to spoil the edge of great Caesar's fame and of yours. Who shall write worthily of Mars in his coat of adamantine mail, or of Meriones black with the dust of Troy, or of Tydeus' son by Pallas' help the match for gods of heaven? It is for us to sing of banquets, of battles of maids flying in their lovers' faces with nails close-cut¹, heart-whole, may be, as we sing, or if feeling the fire, triflers still much after our wont.

¹ Homeric.

7 VII

Laudabunt alii

To Plancus, who has had to leave his beloved Tibur and go campaigning.

I LEAVE others to praise famous Rhodes or Mitylene, or Ephesus, or the walls of Corinth on its two seas, or, if they will, Thebes renowned for Bacchus or Delphi for Apollo or Thessalian Tempe. There are who make it their whole business to chant in an unending song the praises of spotless Pallas' city and to wreath their brow with the olive plucked on every hand. There are many enough who to Juno's glory will tell of Argos and its breed of horses, and of Mycenae with its wealth. For me neither patient Lacedaemon² nor the plain of rich Larissa has such charms as the abode of echoing Albunea¹, and the grove of Tiburnus, and the apple orchards wet with streamlets never still. As the south is often the white wind that sweeps the clouds away from the darkened sky and does not breed showers unceasingly, so do you too, Plancus, be wise and always remember to let the sadness and the toils of life find ending in mellow wine, whether your home be, as now, in the camp gleaming with its standards, or by-and-by under the thick shade of your own Tibur. Teucer, they tell us, when he had to fly from Salamis and from his father's house, yet put a poplar² garland on his temples moist with the dews of the Enfranchiser³, and spoke thus to his downcast friends: 'Where Fortune shall lead us, kinder than a father, there will we go, partners and comrades. No lot is desperate under Teucer's conduct and Teucer's star. For sure is Apollo's promise that in a new land there should be a Salamis to dispute the old name. Brave hearts, heroes who have weathered with me worse storms than this, to-day chase your cares with wine: to-morrow we set out once more upon the boundless sea.'

¹ So as not to hurt. 'The only battles we sing of are battles in play.'

² The land of discipline.

¹ The Tiburtine Sibyl, 'echoing' because her temple was above the waterfall.

² The poplar was sacred to Hercules, the patron of wanderers.

³ Lyæo (λύειν). Horace always uses this name for Bacchus when the thought is of him as a deliverer from care.

VIII

Lydia, dic per omnis

Lydia is bidden not to spoil young Sybaris by keeping him at her apron-strings. The name Sybaris is evidently taken from the historic city on the gulf of Tarentum, which had become a proverb for effeminate luxury.

TELL me, Lydia, by all the gods I adjure you, why you make such haste to ruin Sybaris by your love ; why he hates the sunny Campus, though he has learnt to face sun and dust. Why does he not ride among his compeers in martial exercises, nor tame the mouth of Gaulish colt with wolf-tooth bit ? Why does he shrink from the touch of the yellow Tiber stream ? Why does he shun the wrestler's oil more cautiously than if it were viper's blood ; nor carry any more on his arms the blue marks of manly weapons, though he had so often won fame for throwing the *discus*¹ or the javelin clean beyond the mark ? Why does he hide himself, as they say did the sea-nymph Thetis' son before the sad death-day of Troy, lest a man's garb should snatch him away to face carnage and the Lycian squadrons ?

¹ The discus was not a quoit but a solid disk of stone, about a foot in diameter, held between the fingers and the arm, and the object was to fling it as far as possible. It would naturally mark the arm.

IX

Vides ut alta

Lessons of Epicureanism drawn from a winter scene.

Compare Epod. 13. The person addressed is called by an imaginary name to suit the purpose, 'Thaliarchus,' 'master of the merriment' or 'prince of good cheer.'

YOU see how Soracte¹ stands out white with deep snow, and the straining woods bend beneath their burden, and the keen frost has stayed the running streams. Pile the logs plentifully on the hearth and thaw the cold, and draw out with more generous hand the four-year wine from its Sabine two-eared jar, O prince of good cheer. All else leave to the gods. When they have laid the winds that now battle so fiercely on the yeasty waters, the cypresses are vexed no more, nor the old mountain-ashes. What shall be to-morrow, think not of asking. Each day that Fortune gives you, be it what it may, set down for gain; nor refuse sweet loves while boyhood is yours, nor (I pray you) the dance. so long as youth is green and testy old age is far off. Now again and again seek you the Campus and the public squares, and the soft whispering at nightfall at the hour of tryst; now too the sweet tell-tale laughter from the secret corner which betrays the hiding girl, and the pledge snatched from arm or finger that only feigns resistance.

¹ The conical mountain that attracts the eye in all views to the northward from Rome.

X

Mercuri facundeTo Mercury.An imitation of a Greek Hymn.

MERCURY, Atlas' grandchild eloquent, who by thy wit didst mould the rough manners of new-created man through the gift of speech and the rule of the grace-giving palaestra, thee I would sing, the messenger of mighty Jove and the gods, the parent of the curved lyre, of ready skill to hide whatever it hath pleased thee in freakish theft. Thou wast but a boy when, as he tried to frighten thee with threatening words into restoring the kine which thy craft had spirited away, even as he spoke Apollo laughed to miss his quiver. 'Twas by thy guidance that Priam with his wealth left Ilium and passed unseen through the proud sons of Atreus and the watch-fires of the Thessalians and the camp of Troy's foes. 'Tis thou that takest to their rest in homes of joy the spirits of the good, and with thy golden wand drivest the shadowy throng, favourite alike of gods in the height and in the depth.

XI

Tu ne quaesierisAgainst resorting to Astrologers.

PRAY, ask not. Leuconog—such knowledge is not for us—what end for me, for you, the gods ordain, nor tamper with the Chaldeans' tables. How much better, whatever it is to be, to bear it! Whether Jove grants us many more winters, or this the last which is now breaking the force of the Tyrrhenian sea against the wave-worn cliffs, learn wisdom, clear the wine, and by the thought of life's little span cut short long day-dreams. Even while we speak, Time, the churl, will have been running. Snatch the sleeve of to-day, and trust as little as you may to to-morrow.

XII Quem virum aut heroa

Octavianus is hailed as the crown of Roman history and the hope of the human race.

WHAT man or demi-god dost thou choose to glorify with the lyre or treble flute, what god, O Clio? Whose is the name which freakish Echo shall make ring again either on the shady sides of Helicon or on the heights of Pindus or on cold Haemus, whence the woods followed pellmell behind Orpheus, the master of sound, who by the art his mother taught him stayed the rapid rivers' flow and the swift winds. and knew the spell to give ears to oaks and draw them to listen to the music of his strings? Of what can I tell before the wonted praise of the Sire, who rules the life of men and gods, who rules the sea and land and sky with its changing seasons? From him springs none mightier than himself, nor lives there anything in power like or second to him; yet the place nearest in honour belongs to Pallas. Nor shall I have nought to say of thee, Liber, bold in fights, and thee, the maiden foe of savage beasts, and thee, Apollo, terrible with the unerring arrow. Of Alcides too shall I tell, and the boys of Leda, one famous for victory in the horse-race, the other in the boxing-match. Soon as their white star has shone upon sailors, the wind-driven spray streams down from the rocks, the winds fall, and the clouds scud away, and on the sea the threatening wave, for that they have so willed it, sinks to rest. Next after them I doubt me whether I should tell the tale of Romulus, or of Pompilius' quiet sway, or of the proud rods of Tarquin, or of Cato's glorious death. Regulus and the two Scauri and Paulus, lavish of his great life when the Carthaginian was conquering, will I gratefully name with the Muse's peculiar tribute, aye and Fabricius. He and Curius, of hair unkempt, were bred to do good service in war, and Camillus too, by stern poverty, and the ancestral farm with its cottage home to match. As a tree grows by the unmarked lapse of time, so grows the glory of a Marcellus. As shines the moon among the lesser fires, so amongst all others shines the star of a Julius. Father and guardian of human kind, O son of Saturn, to thee is given, so fate wills it, the care of mighty Caesar. Reign thou, with Caesar for thy vicerent. For him—be it the Parthians who threaten Latium that he shall lead tamed in a well-earned triumph, or the Seres and Indians who border the land of the rising sun—he shall rule in justice the wide world while he bows to thee. Thou with thy ponderous wheels shalt shake Olympus: thou on the groves which are haunts of wickedness shalt hurl the bolts of thy displeasure.

XIII Cum tu, Lydia, TelephiJealousy and Constancy.

LYDIA, while you praise 'Telephus' 'neck like a rose,' 'Telephus' 'arms of wax,' faugh! my liver swells with the hot and angry bile. And then my head reels and my colour comes and goes, and the moisture steals down my cheeks, telling how deep go the slow fires that consume me. It is torture to me if his tipsy brawl has bruised your white shoulders¹ or if the frenzied boy has left tell-tale marks on your lips. If you listened to me as you should, you would never hope that one would prove constant who hurts so barbarously the pretty lips which Venus has touched with the fifth part of her own nectar. Thrice happy they, and more than thrice, whom an unbroken bond holds fast, and whom love, never torn asunder by foolish quarrellings, will not loose till life's last day!

XIV O navis, referent

The ship of the State, at the harbour's mouth, is warned not to drift out again into the sea of civil war.

SHIP, fresh waves are rising and will bear thee out to sea again. O what art thou about? One bold push more and make the harbour! Seest thou not that broadside is bare of oars, and mast crippled by the rushing south-west wind, and yardarms are groaning, and ¹ For the unseemly violence which attended drinking-bouts see the end of Ode 17.

*Like Love
a wit*

without ropes the hull can scarcely weather the too peremptory sea? Thou hast no whole sails, no gods left to call on next time when trouble is heavy. Whatever thy idle boasts of race and name, that thou art a pine of Pontus, the daughter of a lordly forest, the sailor in his fear trusts not in painted sterns. Have care, I pray thee, unless thou art doomed to make sport for the winds. A moment ago to me a weary sickening of heart, still a fond yearning and no light anxiety, see thou avoid the waters which wash between those bright Cyclades.

XV

Pastor cum traheret

The prophecy of Nereus.

WHENAS the shepherd was carrying off Helen, his host's wife, the traitor, across the sea in ships of Ida, Nereus cast on the swift winds an unwelcome calm that he might utter the burden of cruel destiny: 'Under evil omens thou art leading to thy home one whom Greece will come with a host of warriors to reclaim, bound by a common vow to break at one blow thy marriage bond and Priam's ancient realm. Woe is me! How the war-horses, how the heroes will soon be sweating! What a tale of death dost thou open for the Dardan race! Even now Pallas is making ready her helm and her aegis, her chariot and her fury. To no purpose, defiant under the protection of Venus, shalt thou comb out thy head of hair, and with unwarlike cithern give the time to songs such as please women's ears.

To no purpose in lady's chamber shalt thou seek to avoid the heavy spears and arrows of Cretan reed and the battle-din and Ajax swift in pursuit. For all this, ah me! thou shalt one day besmirch in the dust those adulterous locks. Seest thou not behind thee Laertes' son, the ruin of thy race, or Pylian Nestor? Close at thy heels are those who know not fear, Teucer of Salamis and Sthenelus skilled in fight, or if need be to rule the team, no dull charioteer. Meriones too thou shalt come to know. See, Tydeus' relentless son, a better man than his father, is hot to find thee, from whom as from a wolf, seen on the other side of the valley, flies the deer nor stays to think of the grass. so shalt thou fly panting with head in air, like a coward, though thou hadst promised thy mistress a different sight. The angered host of Achilles shall postpone the day of doom for Ilium and the Phrygian mothers. When a fixed tale of winters is told the fire of the Achaeans shall burn the homes of Ilium.'

> XVI

O matre pulchra

A palinode to a lady who has been libelled in verse. It is very probable that the Ode refers to the quarrel, difficult to read, which gives their occasion to Epodes 5 and 17 and Sat. 1. 8.

O FAIRER daughter of a fair mother, what bound soever you will you shall set to my scurrilous iambs¹, by fire, if so it please you, or by the Adrian sea. Not the goddess¹ of Dindymus, not the god of Pytho² when his full presence is in his shrine, not Liber, so shake their priests' reason; the Corybantes clashing again their shrill brass show not such empty fury—as fell anger. Neither iron of Noricum can awe it from its purpose, nor wreck-strewn sea, nor fierce fire, nor Jove himself crashing down in tumult terrible. Prometheus, they tell us, when compelled to add to the primal clay an atom taken from every animal, among the rest placed near our heart the force of the lion's fury. 'Twas anger laid Thyestes low in dread ruin. Anger has been to cities built on high the cause far-traced that each was levelled to the ground, and that the host of proud foemen marked with the ploughshare the line of their walls. Keep a firm rein on your feelings. I too in the sweet season of youth suffered from my heart's hot blood, and in my frenzy was driven into impetuous iambics. Now I would exchange harsh thoughts for mellow ones, provided you would become my friend and give me back your heart.

¹ 'Iambics' is, from their metre, Horace's own name for his Epodes.

➤ XVII

Velox amoenum

To Tyndaris. An invitation to the Sabine Farm.

FLEET Faunus often exchanges Lycaeus³ for lovely Lucretilis⁴, and protects my she-goats from fiery summer sun and from rainy wind. Without harm through safe woods wander those dames of an unfragrant

¹ Cybele.

² Delphi.

³ In Arcadia.

⁴ Mte. Gennaro, the mountain-mass overhanging the Sabine valley in which Horace's farm lay.

squire, seeking the lurking arbutu-bushes and thyme with no terror of green snake or of Haedilia's wolves that Mars loves, when once, Tyndaris, through the vale of low-lying Ustica with its smooth rocks has run the sound of his sweet pipe. ~~Yes, the gods watch over me~~—the gods value my piety and my Muse. Here Plenty, rich in all the pride of the country, shall stream into your lap till it is full. Here in my deep-drawn valley you shall avoid the dog-star's heat, and shall tell on the strings of Teos¹ the tale of Penelope and glass-green Circe sick with one and the same passion². Here in the shade you shall quaff cups of harmless Lesbian, nor shall the son of Semele³—Semele who is Thyone—wage aimless quarrels with Mars, nor shall you fear Cyrus' rough play if in jealousy he lay tipsy hands on you, a poor little match for him, and tear the garland that clings to your hair and your unoffending robe.

Penelope's home

XVIII

Nullam, Vare, sacra

The use and the dangers of wine.

NOT one tree, Varus, must you plant before the god-given vine all about the mellow soil of Tibur and the walls of Catilus⁴. To those who drink not, all

¹ Teos was the home of Anacreon.

² i.e. for Ulysses.

³ The mother of Bacchus. Her name Thyone was from the same root as that of the Thyiads—the frenzied votaries of the god. It is a mythological way of describing the aimless brawls into which a drinking-bout degenerated.

⁴ One of three brothers who were the legendary founders of Tibur.

that heaven ever sets before them is hard; and in no way but in this one do carking cares scatter and fly. Who harps on the toils of campaigning or of poverty after his wine? Who speaks not rather of thee, father Bacchus, and thee, fair Venus? And that none lightly overpass the bounty of Liber who loves moderation there is warning in the strife of Centaurs and Lapithae fought to the death over wine: there is warning in the heavy hand of Evius¹ on the Sithonii when in their greedy haste they divide right from wrong by the slender line of their own appetite. For me I will never disturb thee against thy will, bright and beautiful Bassareus¹, nor snatch into the light what is hidden under those many-tinted leaves. Silence the fierce drums and the horn of Berecynthus², in whose train follows blind Self-love and Vainglory, lifting far too high her empty head, and Faith that blabs out her secret, more transparent than glass.

XIX

Mater saeva CupidinumThe relapse.

THE imperious mother of Loves and the son of Semele and wanton Idlesse bid me give my heart back to a passion which I had ended. I feel the fire at sight of Glycera's bright beauty, of purer lustre than Parian marble. I feel the fire at her pretty sauciness and that face, to look on which is to slip from your resolve. To descend on me with all her force, Venus has left Cyprus empty, nor will she suffer me to say a word of Scythian or Parthian, brave on his flying steed, or aught that is irrelevant. Here place for me the fresh turf, here place sacred boughs and frankincense and a goblet of last year's wine. When I have offered a victim she will come in gentler sort.

¹ Names of Bacchus.

² A mountain on which Cybele was worshipped.

XX

Vile potabis

An invitation addressed to Maecenas.

IT will be cheap Sabine that you will have to drink from my modest cups—wine which I stored myself and sealed in a Greek crock at that time, dear knight Maecenas, when you were greeted in the theatre¹ with rounds of applause till the banks of your ancestral river² and the freakish echo of the Vatican hill repeated to you your praises. I must leave you³ to drink Caecuban and the grape crushed in the presses of Cales. My cups are not mellowed by the vines of Falernum or the produce of the Formian hills.

> XXI

Dianam tenerae

A hymn in honour of Diana and Apollo.

TELL of Diana, gentle maidens; of unshorn Cynthia tell, my boys, and of Latona dear to the inmost heart of supreme Jove. Do you [maidens] praise her that rejoices in the streams, and in every leafy head of the forest that rises high on cold Algidus, or in the black woods of Erymanthus or of green Cragus. Do you, the male chorus, with praise for praise, extol Tempe and Delos, Apollo's birthplace, and him whose shoulder is decked with the quiver and his brother's lyre. Moved by your prayers he will drive away tearful war, drive away the woes of famine and plague from our people and Caesar our prince on to the Persians and the Britons.

¹ On recovery from a serious illness, see Od. 2. 17.

² The 'Tuscan' Tiber, Maecenas being Etruscan.

³ i.e. at home.

XXII

Integer vitae

The secret of safety and happiness.

Addressed to Aristius Fuscus. (See Epist. I. 10.)

HE that is unstained in life and pure from guilt needs not, Fuscus, the Moor's javelin or bow or quiver laden with poisoned arrows, whether he be going to make his way through the surf of the Syrtes, or the unharboured¹ Caucasus or the lands which storied Hydaspes washes. For even at sight of me once in a Sabine wood, as I was singing the praise of my Lalage and straying beyond bounds in careless mood. unarmed though I was, a wolf turned and fled, a monster such as Apulia, the home of warriors, does not rear in its broad oak-forests nor the land of Juba breed in her deserts, the nursing-mother of lions. Place me where on the dull plain there is no tree to be wakened to new life by the breeze of summer, the side of the world on which clouds and inclement Jove press heavily, place me beneath the chariot of the too neighbouring sun in a land forbidden to human dwelling, still shall I love Lalage and her sweet laughter, Lalage and her sweet prattle.

¹ 'unharboured heaths, Infamous hills.' Comus.

XXIII

Vitas inuleo

The shy maiden.

YOU fly me, Chloe, like a fawn looking for its timid dam on the pathless mountain-side not without empty terrors of wind and wood. (For if through the light-hung leaves has run the shiver of Spring's approach, or if a green lizard has moved aside a bramble, it trembles in heart and knees.) Yet I am not pursuing you as an angry tigress or lion of Gaetulia to crush you in my teeth. 'Tis time to leave off running after your mother now that you are ripe for a husband.

XXIV

Quis desiderio

Addressed to Virgil on the death of Quintilius, a man of letters, the honest critic described in the Art of Poetry.

What is offered is a hint of self-restraint rather than a consolation; but we must feel the delicacy and the genuine sympathy with which it is offered. A further insight into the purport of the Ode is given by the statement in the 'Life of Virgil' by Donatus the grammarian, that Virgil had frequently on his tongue the saying that 'there was no virtue more adapted to man's estate than patience, and

Virgil's life of Virgil, p. 100, says that Virgil was induced.

that by wise exercise of it a brave man could overcome every assault of fortune.'

WHAT shame or measure should there be in grief for one so dear? Lead the mournful strain, Melpomene, to whom the Sire gave with the cithern the voice of clear tone. So then the sleep which knows no waking lies heavy on Quintilius! When shall Modesty find again his peer, and stainless Faith, own sister to Justice, and naked Truth? Many a good man may weep for his death: none may weep with more right than thou, Virgil. Thou askest Quintilius of the gods: but ah! thy piety has been misplaced¹—thou didst not trust him to them for this! What if, with a charm beyond that of Orpheus, thou wieldedst a lyre which the trees would listen to? Not even then might the blood return to the hollow shade which once with his abhorred wand Mercury, who relents not, nor opens the door of fate for prayers, has gathered to the black fold. 'Tis hard. But what may not be altered is made lighter by patience.

XXVI

Musis amicus

Lamia and the Muses.

THE Muses' friend, sadness and fears I will commit to the wild winds to take with them to the Cretan sea. Who is the dreaded king of the frozen coast near the North Pole, what are the fears of Tiridates¹, I care not, though all the world may care. O thou who joyest in fresh wellsprings, twine sunny flowers, twine a chaplet, sweet Muse, for my Lamia. Without thee honours that I can give avail nothing. He is one whom it well beseems thee and thy sisters to immortalize with a new lyre and the quill of Lesbos².

¹ Frustratus. This is the expression of Horace's impulsive sympathy. The attitude of Virgil himself, the gentle and reverent poet, towards unintelligible 'dispensations' is expressed in his phrase dis aliter visum, 'the gods judged otherwise.'

XXVII

Natis in usum

The drinking-bout and the secret.

WITH cups which Nature meant for uses of joy 'tis for Thracians to fight. No such barbarous custom here! Defend from bloodstained brawls Bacchus the shamefaced. Vast indeed is the interval that divides the Mede's dagger from wine and lamps. Quiet the impious clamour, comrades, and lie still with elbow in the cushion. What, you wish me too to take my share of the rough Falernian? Well, then Locrian Megilla's brother must tell us what the wound, whose the arrow, by which he dies a happy death. Falters your will? On no other terms will I drink. Whoever the love-queen that sways you, the passion need raise no blush: your fancy is sure to be for a freeborn beauty.

¹ The two phrases together stand for the foreign politics of the moment—the 'king' is Cotiso, king of the Dacians, named in Ode 3. 8; Tiridates was the brother and rival of Phraates for the Parthian throne.

² i.e. a Roman lyric poem after the model of Alcaeus. Plectrum, translated here and elsewhere 'quill,' was, as the word implies, an instrument used for striking the strings of the lyre.

Whatever the secret, come, trust it to my safe ear.
 Ah! unhappy boy! In what a Charybdis, all the while, you are struggling—you that deserve a better flame! What witch, what wizard with Thessalian enchantments, what god shall be able to set you loose? Scarce Pegasus¹ will free you from the folds of that three-formed Chimaera.

XXVIII

Te maris et terrae

Archytas, or the claims of our common humanity.

The view adopted of this difficult Ode is that which puts the whole of it into the mouth of the corpse of a shipwrecked sailor which some one has found lying on the shore. In the first part of the Ode the dead man is supposed to address Archytas, the Pythagorean philosopher, whose tomb is in sight: 'You too are dead: no one escapes—not even your great master, Pythagoras, in spite of his belief in the transmigration of souls.' In the second he appeals to the passer-by, taking him for a sailor like himself, for the sake of their common humanity, to cast on his body the three handfuls of sand that would suffice to enable his shade to pass the Styx, which the unburied could not do.

THE measurer of sea and land and of the sands that are without number², the tribute of a handful of dust holds thee fast, Archytas, by the Matine shore;

¹ The winged horse from the back of which Bellerophon shot at and killed the Chimaera.

² Archytas is addressed as the great mathematician, and there is reference to a treatise by him called 'Psammnites,' 'the book about sand,' the point of which was the possibility of finding expression for very large numbers.

nor aught avails it thee to have climbed in thought the homes of the sky and ranged from end to end of the round heaven; for thou hadst still to die. Died Pelops' sire too, the guest of gods, and Tithonus though he was rapt into the sky, and Minos though he was admitted to the secrets of Jove. And the son of Panthus¹ is safe in Tartarus since he descended a second time to the lower world, for all that before (for he took down the shield and proved his knowledge of the days of Troy) he had yielded to black death no spoils beyond mere sinews and skin—by thy witness no mean master he of nature and of truth. But one and the same night awaits us all, and the path of death must once be trodden. Some the Furies give to make shows for grim Mars. The greedy sea is the destruction of those who go in ships. Of young and old without difference the funerals crowd along. There is no head that imperious Proserpine ever feared to touch². Me too the south wind, boisterous comrade of Orion at his setting, whelmed in Illyrian waters. But thou, sailor, grudge not churlishly a handful of the drifting sand to my unburied bones and skull: so what promise soever of

¹ The 'son of Panthus' is Euphorbus, a Trojan in the Iliad. Pythagoras is said, as a proof of his assertion that in a previous incarnation he had been Euphorbus, to have identified the shield of Euphorbus in an Argive temple.

² Cf. Virgil, Aen. 4. 698 sq., of Dido's death (Conington's translation):

Not yet Proserpina had shred
The yellow ringlet from her head,
Nor stamped upon that pallid brow
The token of the powers below.

ill the east wind has in store for the western waves, may Venusia's woods feel his vengeance and thou be safe, and a stream of rich reward, whence only it can, pour into thy lap from kindly Jove and Neptune, guardian of sacred Tarentum! Art thou careless of committing a crime that shall bring punishment presently on thy innocent children? Who knows but that in thine own person the debt of justice and a return of contumely may be in store for thee? If I am deserted, my prayers shall not be unavenged: and for thee, no expiations shall release thee. Whatever be thy haste, the delay is not long: sprinkle the dust thrice, and thou mayst go on thy way.

XXIX

Icci, beatiss

The scholar turning soldier. For Iccius see Epist. 1. 12.

WHAT now, Iccius! hankering after the treasures of Araby the blest, and planning fierce campaigns against the never-conquered chiefs of Sabaea, and linking chains for the terrible Mede! Have you chosen the barbarian maiden who is to wait on you when you have slain her lover, or the court-page with perfumed locks who is to stand as your cupbearer, though he was trained to draw the arrows of the far East on his father's bow? Who can say that the downward streams may not flow back up the mountain side and Tiber run the other way, when you, despite better promises, make haste to exchange for Spanish corslets the costly library you had gathered from far and near, the rolls of noble Panaetius, and the whole household of Socrates¹?

XXX

O Venus, regina

Venus is bidden to the shrine which Glycera has prepared for her.

O VENUS, queen of Cnidus and of Paphos, desert Cyprus of thy choice, and transfer thy presence to the comely shrine to which Glycera bids thee with her clouds of frankincense. With thee haste too thy glowing boy, and Graces and Nymphs with kirtles free, and Youth that without thee can scarcely please, and Mercurius!

XXXI

Quid dedicatum

The poet's modest prayer. Written for the dedication of the great temple of Apollo on the Palatine.

WHAT prayer to Apollo on his dedication day does his poet offer? What asks he as he pours from the bowl the libation of new wine? Not rich Sardinia's fertile cornland; not the well-favoured herds of hot Calabria; not gold nor India's ivory; not champaign through which the quiet waters of Liris' noiseless stream wear their way. Let those to whom it is fortune's gift prune luxuriant vines at Cales, and let the trader drain from goblet of gold wines for which he bartered his Syrian wares—the favourite surely he of the gods themselves, seeing that thrice and four times in a year he visits the Atlantic sea and comes back safe ! As for me, my fare is olives, endive, and the light mallows. Be thy boon to me, son of Latona, both in full strength to enjoy the goods the gods provide me (only, I pray thee, be a sound mind among them !) and to spend an old age neither unhonoured nor unsolaced by the cithern.

¹ Panaetius was a Stoic philosopher. The 'household of Socrates' will be the schools of philosophy which owed their impulse to his questioning.

XXXII

Poscimur: si quid

To his lute, when he has been asked for some poem of a graver cast than usual.

THEY call for us. If ever in hour of leisure beneath the shade you and I have carolled together what may live for this and many another year, come give voice to a Latin strain¹, my lute, tuned first by Lesbos' citizen, who though so keen in battle yet even amid the clash of arms, or if he had moored on the oozy shore his wave-tossed bark, would sing of Liber and the Muses and Venus and the boy who clings to her side, and Lycus with beauty of black eyes and black hair. O shell, the pride of Phoebus, and welcome at the feasts of highest Jove, sweet balm of toils, hail, and help me whenever I duly call thee.

¹ A strain which shall be for Rome what those of Alcaeus were for Lesbos and Greece. 'Alcaeus too,' he says, 'had his light themes as well as his serious ones.'

XXXIII

Albi, ne doleasThe freaks of fancy.Addressed (like Epist. i. 4) to Albius Tibullus, the poet.

LEST you grieve, Albius, too much over thoughts of bitter-sweet Glycera¹, or drone for ever those piteous elegies, asking why a younger lover eclipses you in her faithless heart, think how Lycoris with the beautiful low forehead is in despair for love of Cyrus; Cyrus turns aside after prudish Pholoe: but sooner will she-goats pair with Apulian wolves than Pholoe stoop to an ugly lover. So Venus will have it. Her delight is to bind in malicious sport ill-matched faces and souls beneath a yoke of brass. So it happened to myself. Just when a nobler love was offering itself to me, I was fast held in sweet fetters by slave-born Myrtale, of sharper temper than the water of Hadria that breaks into bays the Calabrian shore.

XXXIV

Parcus deorumAn Epicurean converted by thunder in a clear sky.

AGRUDGING and infrequent worshipper of the gods, whilst I strayed, the professor of a wisdom that is folly, I have been forced now to turn my sails backward and steer again in the course which I had abandoned. For the Father of day, who commonly flashes his lightning fire through rent clouds, this time has driven through a clear sky the horses of thunder and winged car, whereat brute earth and wandering streams, whereat Styx and the abhorred abode of hateful Taenarus and the bound of Atlas rock to their foundations. God has power to change the place of highest and lowest. He humbles the famous and brings forward those that are in the shade. One sharp whistle of her wings, and Fortune has snatched and lifted the tiara from one head and is rejoicing to have placed it on another.

¹ A play on the name of Glycera, which means 'sweet.'

XXXV

O diva, gratum

To Fortune.

Fortune, the mistress of all human life, is invoked to bless Caesar in his patriotic enterprises.

O GODDESS, queen of thy loved Antium, a present Power either to lift from the dust frail mortal man or to change to a funeral train the proud triumphal procession, thee the poor countryman courts with anxious prayer, thee, queen of the ocean, whoever tempts in Bithynian bark the Carpathian sea. Thee the Dacian fears, who stands at bay, the Scythians who fly, and towns and peoples, and Latium that fronts the world¹, and mothers of barbarian kings, and despots in their purple, lest with contumelious foot thou thrust before thee the upright pillar², lest the crowding populace arouse 'to arms' the loiterers, 'to arms,' and break in pieces their power. Before thee goes ever stern Doom, bearing in her brazen hand huge beam-nails and wedges: nor lack there the inexorable clamp and molten lead. Thee Hope waits on and Faith so rare, clad in white garments, nor does she leave thee companionless whensoever with changed garb thou desertest in displeasure the homes of the great. But the faithless crowd, the harlot forsworn, draw away. When casks are drained to the dregs, friends scatter who have no mind to take their share of the yoke. O guard thou Caesar on his coming journey to the Britons at the world's end! Guard thou the new swarm of our young warriors, the terror of Eastern quarters and of the Indian sea! Ah me! the shame of guilty scars from brothers' hands! From what has our cruel age shrunk? What wickedness have we left unessayed? From what has this generation held its hand for fear of heaven? What altars has it spared? O that thou wouldst forge on some new anvil the blunted sword, to be drawn on Massagetae and Arabians!

¹ Ferox here exactly corresponds to Goldsmith's 'Pride in their port, defiance in their eye.'

² The picture, a metaphorical one, is of Fortune, like Samson, breaking down the pillar on which the whole edifice of their estate rests.

XXXVI

Et ture et fidibus

On the return of his friend Numida, from the Spanish war.

WITH frankincense and with music and with duly paid blood of a young calf would I seek the favour of the gods that watch over Numida, who now safely returned from the furthest West has many a kiss for one and another of dear comrades, for none more than for his sweet Lania as he thinks of boyhood passed under one and the same king's rule and of gown changed together. The fair day must not lack a chalk-stone to mark it—the wine-jar must be brought out and there must be no stint of it—no rest for the feet in Salian¹ fashion. Bassus to-day must equal Damalis, for all her strong head, in Thracian drinking feats. Roses must not be wanting to the feast, nor long-lived parsley nor short-lived lily.

XXXVII

Nunc est bibendumThe death of Cleopatra.

NOW we must drink. now beat the earth with free step: now, my comrades, 'twas the fitting time to lay on gods' cushions a feast worthy of the Salii². Ere this it had been a sin to have brought out the Caecuban from our grandsires' bins, while the Queen was plotting in her frenzy ruin for the Capitol and a grave for our Empire, with her polluted crew of shamed creatures, giving the rein to the audacity of her hopes, and drunken with fortune's sweet cup. But her madness abated when scarce a ship escaped the fire; and her reason, panic-stricken after her draughts of Mareotic wine, Caesar brought back to the fears of soberness, hotly pursuing her as she fled from Italy, like a hawk after tender wood-pigeons or swift hunter after hare on the plain of snowy Haemonia, that he might consign to chains that portent of disaster. But she, set on a nobler end, shrank not with womanly terror from the sword, nor sought to win by her swift ships some shore of hiding, but dared with calm brow to visit her ruined palace, and was brave to handle fell serpents so that she might drink into her veins the deadly poison, more defiant for her resolve to die. Yea, she grudged to the cruel Liburnian sloops their will that she should be led; no tame-souled woman, unqueened in a proud triumphal procession.

¹ The Salii were priests of Mars. Dancing was part of their worship, and, in the general belief, the origin of their name (from salire.)

² See the last note. The Colleges of priests had a reputation for luxurious banquets; see the end of Ode 2. 14.

> XXXVIII

Persicos odi

*Simplicity*¹.

PERSIAN luxury, boy, I hate. I have no taste for garlands twined with linden bark. Cease your efforts to find where the last rose lingers. I would have you take no thought or trouble to add anything to plain myrtle. Myrtle misbeseems neither you as you serve nor me as I drink under the trellised vine.

¹ Notice the effect of this little Ode and its subject as a relief after the last one.

BOOK II

> I

Motum ex Metello

Addressed to C. Asinius Pollio (the Pollio of Virgil's Fourth Eclogue) one of the most accomplished men of the age. He wrote tragedies of which Virgil, as well as Horace, speaks in the highest terms. He founded the first public library at Rome out of the spoils of his Dalmatian campaign. He is said to have introduced the practice, which had such a large place in the subsequent history of Roman literature, of an author reading a new work to an audience. There is probably allusion to this practice in the present Ode. He is now writing a history of the Civil War which Horace is eagerly looking for.

THE stir of civil strife from the consulship of Metellus ¹ downwards, the causes of war and its crimes and its fashions, the game of Fortune, leagues, deadly in issue, of chief leaders, and weapons dyed in streams of blood not expiated yet—such is the theme, full of the die's hazard, which you take in hand, treading over fires hidden under a treacherous crust of ashes.

For a little while yet suffer the theatres to miss the Muse of solemn Tragedy. By-and-by when you have set in order your tale of state affairs, you shall go back to the great task of the buskin worthy of Athens, O chiefest stay of the accused in their mourning and of the senate-house at its counsels. my Pollio. to whom the laurel of

¹ B.C. 60, the year of the league between Pompey, Crassus, and Lepidus (spoken of in the following words) to which such fatal issues were attributed.

between Books I & II

Dalmatian triumph has won everlasting honour. Already we are deafened with the blast of threatening horns, already the clarions begin to bray, already the gleam of arms is scaring the horses till they would fain fly and the bold front of the horsemen. Already methinks I am hearing of mighty captains begrimed with no inglorious dust, and all the world humbled save Cato's stubborn soul. Juno and any other of the gods who, though they loved the Africans, had yet retired in impotence and left their land unavenged, now have paid, to appease Jugurtha's spirit, the children's children of his conquerors. What plain fattened with Latin blood bears not witness by its barrows to fratricidal battles, and to the sound of Hesperia's downfall which has been heard afar by the Mede? What deep, what rivers, have known nothing of our sad warfare? What sea is not stained with Daunian carnage? What shore is clean from blood of ours?

(Nay, wanton Muse, leave not thy sportive themes to take up the unfinished task of the dirge of Ceos¹. Come away, and in the grot of Dione's daughter² find some measure for a lighter quill.

II

Nullus argento

The right use of wealth. The Ode is addressed to Sallustius Crispus, but the person most in view is Proculeius, who is named as an example of such a right use. He was brother-in-law to Maecenas, and the story went that when his brothers had lost their property in the civil war he had divided his own portion with them.

¹ i.e. of Simonides of Ceos.

² i.e. Venus.

SILVER has no shine while it is hidden in the miserly earth, my Sallustius Crispus, no friend to bar of gold unless it gets brightness from a wisely guided use. Proculcius will live beyond the term of life, for the world knows him for his heart as that of a father towards his brothers. He shall be borne on wings that dare not droop by fame which dies not with him. You may rule a broader realm by taming a greedy spirit than if you could join Libya to distant Gades and the Carthaginian of either shore owned one master. The dread dropsy grows by indulging itself. It never gets quit of the thirst till the cause of the malady has been driven from the veins and the weary weight of the water from the blanched body. Virtue is at issue with the crowd in striking from the roll of the happy Phraates just set again on Cyrus' throne. She would fain unteach the world the false use of titles. She offers to one and one alone the kingdom and the diadem in safety and the bay for his own—the one, whoever he be, that can see huge treasure-heaps and never turn to look again.

7 III

Aequam memento

To Dellius. An Epicurean Ode, to match the Stoicism of the last one. The thought of death as a motive for 'letting no flower of the spring pass us by.'

REMEMBER when life's path is steep to keep your mind even, and as much when things are prosperous to keep it chastened from extravagant joy. O

Dellius, who have still to die, whether you have spent all your days in mourning, or flung at your length on some quiet grass-plot from holiday to holiday have made yourself happy with the oldest bin of Falernian ! To what end, think you. huge pine and white poplar love to join in partnership their hospitable shade ? Why frets the runaway water in its haste to escape down its tortuous channel ? This is the spot ; bid bring wine and unguents and the too shortlived flowers of the lovely rose, while fortune and our years and the black threads of the three sisters allow us. You will leave the forest pastures that you have bought up, and town mansion, and country house by yellow Tiber's stream, you will leave them, and the riches piled so high will belong to an heir. It matters nothing whether rich and born of old Inachus' line¹, or poor and of the dregs of the people, you linger out your span under heaven, the victim due to Orcus who has no pity. We all are driven one road. For all alike the lot is being shaken in the urn and, be it sooner or later, will leap out and place us in Charon's bark for everlasting exile.

IV

Ne sit ancillae

The situation described and the irony of its treatment are as clear as Horace meant them to be, whether we suppose 'Phocian Xanthias' to be a Greek in Roman society, or a shadow, or a literary name for some one whom contemporaries would recognize.

YOUR love for a handmaid need cost you no blushes, Phocian Xanthias. Remember that Achilles long ago for all his arrogance was won by the snowy tints of the slave-girl Briseis. Ajax, Telamon's son, was won by the fair form of Tecmessa, though he was lord and she his bondwoman. The son of Atreus in the midst of his triumph was fired by love of a captive maiden after the barbarian hosts had gone down before the Thessalian conqueror, and Hector's loss had given Pergamus an easier prey to the tired Greeks. You may be pretty sure flaxen-haired Phyllis has wealthy parents to whom you may be proud to be son-in-law. A royal house at the least she mourns and unkind household gods. Believe that in her you have not loved one of the rabble crowd; that one so constant, one who so scorns gain, could not be born of a mother whom you need blush for. I am heartwhole when I praise her arms and face and shapely ankles. Fie! suspect not one whose age has been hurrying to close its eighth lustre.

¹ i.e. of ancient, even mythical, ancestry.

> VI

Septimi, Gades

To Septimius (see Epist. 1. 9). Praises of Tibur and of Tarentum.

SEPTIMIUS, that would go with me to Gades, and to the Cantabrian who has not learnt yet to bear our yoke, and to the savage Syrtes where the Moorish surf for ever boils, give me rather for the home of my old age Tibur founded by Argive settler; give me—for I am weary of them—some limit to wanderings by sea and land and to campaigning. If that place be forbidden me by unkind destinies, then I would make for Galaesus' stream that the skin-covered flocks love well, and the country-side where Laconian Phalantus ruled. That nook of earth's surface has a smile for me before all other places. Its honey yields not to Hymettus, and its olive rivals green Venafrum. There Jove grants long springs and mild winters; and Aulon, the favourite of fruitful Bacchus, has least reason to envy the grapes of Falernum. That is the spot, that the happy stronghold that invites us both. There you shall drop the tributary tear on the hot ashes of your poet-friend.

VII . O saepe mecum

To Pompeius. A reminiscence of Philippi.

O FRIEND that many a time faced fearful odds with me when Brutus led the war, who has given you back a citizen once more to the gods of your sires and the sky of Italy? Pompeius, chiefest of my comrades, with whom many a time when the day lagged I have broken it with a drinking-bout, a garland on my hair all shining with Syrian nard! We were together when I felt the shock of Philippi and the headlong rout, my poor shield ingloriously left behind me, what time Virtue¹ broke and those who threatened high bit the dust in defeat². But for me, swift Mercury lifted and bore me away all trembling through the foe-men in a thick mist; you the wave's downdraught in that boiling surf carried back again into the war. So then you must pay to Jove the bounden sacrifice, and lay your limbs, wearied with the long warfare, safe beneath my bay-tree, and never spare the wine-jars which have been set apart for your use. Fill up the polished beakers with the Massic that brings forgetfulness. Pour unguents from large shells. Who is seeing to wreath a hasty garland of dewy parsley or of myrtle? Whom will the Venus throw¹ name president of the feast? For me, my revel shall be as wild as the Edonians'. To have recovered a lost friend is to me a sweet excuse for madness.

¹ Virtus, lit. 'the quality of a man,' has on it here from the context the special colour of 'Valour': but the more general sense is necessary also, for there is a reference to the dying words of Brutus, 'Poor virtue!' &c.; see Introduction, p. 10.

² For the bearing and sober meaning of all this see in the same place.

VIII

Ulla si iuris

An incorrigible. To Barine.

IF ever, Barine, you had felt the smallest punishment for perjury, if you were less fair by one discoloured tooth or by one nail, I would believe you. But in your case, so soon as you have laid on your head the burden of broken vows, you sparkle out much the fairer for it, and come abroad to break the hearts of all our youth. You find it to your profit to swear falsely by the ashes of a mother's tomb and the silent markers of the night with all the stars of heaven and the gods whom death's icy hand touches not. Venus herself laughs, laughs, I say, at it. The Nymphs laugh for all their simplicity, and Cupid for all his fierceness, sharpening all the time his burning arrows on bloodstained whetstone. You may say too that all our youth, as they grow up, grow to be slaves to you; nor do your former ones desert the home of their perjured mistress, often as they threaten it.

¹ See the end of Ode 1. 4. The highest throw of the four tali, a special kind of dice, was when all four turned up the same face.

IX

Non semper imbres

A dissuasive from too much grief. To Valgius, the poet.

THE rains drop not always from the clouds on drenched fields, nor gusty storms still vex¹ the Caspian sea. The dull ice stands not stiff the whole year through, good friend Valgius, in Armenian coasts, nor north winds strain the oak forests of Garganus, and widow the ashes of their leaves. But always with your tearful strains you pursue your lost Mystes; your passion gives you no respite when the evening star rises, nor when he flies before the striding sun. Yet the old man who lived thrice the life of men did not lament all his years for his darling Antilochus: his parents and sisters in Troy did not weep always for young Troilus. Cease—it is time—weak wailings, and let us rather sing the new triumphs of Augustus, and icebound Niphates, and how the Median river added to the conquered world rolls its waters more humbly, and the Geloni ride their narrowed steppes within bounds set to them.

¹ 'The still-vex'd Bermoothes.' The Tempest.

X

Rectius vivesThe golden mean. To Licinius.

YOU will live a happier life, Licinius, by neither steering always for the deep sea nor in cautious dread of storms hugging too close a dangerous shore. Whoso loves well the golden mean avoids the squalor of a ruinous hovel and is safe, is sober and avoids the palace that attracts envy. It is the giant pine that rocks the oftener in the wind, and the tall towers that come down with the heavier fall, and the mountain summits that the lightnings strike. The heart that is well forearmed hopes when times are adverse, and when they are favourable fears, a change of fortune. Jove brings back again the unlovely winters. The same hand removes them. If things are ill to-day, they will not therefore be so presently. Apollo wakes sometimes the music that lies silent in his cithern, nor keeps his bow for ever strung. In straits of fortune show front of courage and endurance, and no less you will be wise to shorten your bellying sail when the wind follows too freely.

XI

Quid bellicosusCounsels of an Epicurean. Addressed to Quinctius Hirpinus.

WHAT the war-loving Cantabrian intends¹, what the Scythian beyond the broad barrier of Hadria, a truce to asking, Quinctius Hirpinus! Weary not yourself for the provision of life, which needs but little. Youth with its smooth cheeks and grace of form is flying behind us, as grey hairs and wrinkled skin banish love and play and sleep that came at will. Spring flowers keep not their pride unchanged for ever, nor does the blushing moon shine always with same face. Why overtask with plans for the far future a soul that is no match for them? Why are we not drinking, stretched beneath some tall plane-tree or, if you will, just as we are, under yonder pine, while still we may, our grey hairs perfumed with rose garlands and anointed with Assyrian nard? Evius¹ can scatter the cares that prey on us. Ho! a boy with speed to quench with water from the running brook the fire of Falernian cups, a boy to entice Lyde the truant from her home! Bid her come quick with her ivory lyre, her hair bound up in a neat knot like a Spartan maid.

¹ 'And what the Swede intend, and what the French.' Milton, Sonnet 21.

XII

Nolis longa feræ

To be compared with Ode 1. 6. Here it is Maecenas that has asked Horace to write historical Odes on Caesar's exploits.

YOU would not wish that the long war of stubborn Numantia or hard Hannibal or the Sicilian sea crimson with Punic blood should be set to the soft measures of the cithern, any more than the fell Lapithæ and Hylæus overcharged with wine and the taming by Hercules' arm of the sons of Earth, at the peril of whose onset all ancient Saturn's shining home had rocked with fear. And so you, Maecenas, will better tell in the prose of history the tale of Caesar's battles and of the necks of threatening kings dragged in triumph along our ways. For me, the sweet Muse has willed that I should tell of the singing of your queen Licymnia, her brightly shining eyes and her heart loyal to mutual love, whom it has not misbeseemed to foot it in the dance, nor to mix in the skirmish of wit, nor to link arm in sport with the maidens in trim array on the sacred day that fills Diana's temple. You, would you take all that rich Achaemenes held, or Mygdon's wealth in fat Phrygia, or the well-stored homes of the Arabs for a single lock of your Licymnia's hair, when she bends her neck to the warm kiss, or with playful cruelty refuses what it is her pleasure more than the asker's to have snatched from her, what sometimes she is the first to snatch?

¹ Bacchus.

➤ XIII

Ille et nefasto

The thoughts suggested by the poet's narrow escape from death by the fall of a tree on his Sabine farm.

IT was on an evil day that he planted thee, whoever he was, in the old time, and with an impious hand that he reared thee, O tree, to be the bane of his children's children and the scandal of the village. I could believe that he wrung his own father's neck and sprinkled his hearth with a guest's midnight blood. He handled poisons of Colchis, and every wicked thing that is conceived all the world over, who set thee up upon my land, thee, ill-omened bit of timber, thee so ready to fall on the head of thy innocent master.

What special danger to avoid, man is never forewarned from hour to hour as he need be. The Punic sailor dreads with all his soul the Bosphorus, nor beyond that fears the blind blows of fate from any other quarter. The soldier dreads the arrows of the swiftly flying Parthian, the Parthian the chains of an Italian prison-house. But it is a blow of death not foreseen that has snatched and will snatch away all the world alike.

How nearly were we seeing the realm of dark Proserpine, and Aeacus on his seat of judgement, and the separate abode of good souls, and Sappho on Aeolian strings making plaint of the maidens of her people, and thee, Alcaeus, with golden quill sounding in richer strains the hardships of shipwreck, the sad hardships of exile, hardships of war! Round both stand the shades in wonder at strains worthy of sacred silence; but most the tale of battles and of banished tyrants the crowd, shouldering close, drinks greedily. What marvel, when spellbound at that singing the hundred-headed monster droops his black ears and the snakes twined in the Furies' hair take rest! Nay, Prometheus too and Pelops' sire forget their woe at the sweet sound; and Orion cares not to pursue his lions and frightened lynxes.

XIV

Eheu fugaces

A sad view of the shortness of life. To Postumus.

AH me, Postumus, Postumus, the fleeting years are slipping by, nor will piety give a moment's stay to wrinkles and hurrying old age and death the unconquerable:—no, my friend, not if with three hecatombs for every day that passes you should try to appease Pluto the tearless, who holds fast Geryones the triple giant and Tityos beyond the sad water, aye, the water on which we must all take the final voyage, all we that eat earth's fruits, whether we be kings or needy peasants. It will not help us to have kept clear of the bloodshed of Mars and the breakers of hoarse Hadria. It will not help us to have shunned, the autumn through, the sirocco deadly to the human frame. Cocytus we needs must visit, wandering black with sluggish stream, and Danaus' ill-famed family, and Sisyphus, son of Aeolus, sentenced to long toil. This earth we needs must leave, and house and wife of our choice; nor of the trees which you tend shall any save the hated cypresses go along with their short-lived master. An heir who will put it to a better use shall drain to the dregs the Caecuban you hoarded under a hundred padlocks, and dye the pavement with the titled wine more choice than pontiffs drink at their banquets.

7 XV

Iam pauca aratro

A complaint of the growth of private magnificence and luxury.

PILES of royal magnificence will soon leave but few acres to the plough. On every side there will be fishponds to be seen of wider extent than the Lucrine lake, and the unwedded plane-tree will drive the elm from the field¹. Violet-beds too and myrtles and the fulness of all that pleases the nostrils will scatter fragrance where oliveyards were fruitful for former masters, and the laurel boughs will make a thick screen from the sun's fiery shafts. Not such was the lesson taught by the example of Romulus and bearded Cato and the rule of old days. In their time private revenues were small, the common stock large. Private citizens had no colonnades measured out with ten-foot rules and opening to the shady north; nor did the laws allow them to despise the chance-cut turf, though they bade them adorn their cities at the public cost and the temples of the gods with new-hewn stone.

¹ i.e. trees that were for ornament only would supersede those which were used as supporters for vines.

XVI

Otium divos

To Grosphus. (See Epist. 1. 12.)

Peace and happiness depend on ourselves, not on things outside us.

PEACE is the prayer of one caught in a storm on the open Aegean, at the moment when black clouds have hidden the moon, and the stars on which to rely no longer shine. Peace is the prayer of Thrace, though it is raving mad for the battle—peace of the Mede, though his adornment is the quiver—peace, Grosphus, which we cannot buy for gems nor for purple nor for gold. For no treasures, no consul's lictor can bid disperse the miserable insurgent crowds of the mind and the cares that flit round panelled roofs. A happy life is his, though his means are small, on whose modest board shines bright the heirloom salt-cellar, and whom no fears nor mean desires rob of untroubled sleep. Why, with our short years, are we so bold to aim our shaft at many marks? Why change our home for lands warm with another sun? What exile from his country finds that he has left himself also behind? Care that comes of fault boards the brazen trireme, nor is outridden by the squadrons of horsemen, swifter than stag, swifter than Eurys when he drives the storm clouds. When happy for the moment, the heart should shun all thought for what is beyond: and if the cup is bitter, sweeten it with the smile of patience. No lot is happy on all sides. Achilles in his glory was taken away by an early death. His long old age wore Tithonus to a shadow. And to me perhaps time in its course will proffer something that it has denied to you. You have a hundred flocks and Sicilian kine lowing all round you. You have a whinnying mare now fit for the chariot race. You are clothed in wool twice dipped in African purple. To me Fate, who breaks not her promise, gave the modest farm, and with it the fine inspiration of the Grecian Muse, and the power to rise above the spiteful crowd.

➤XVII

Cur me querelis

The poet consoles Maecenas in illness and protests that they must die together.

WHY take heart and life from me by your complaints? It is not as the gods will, nor as I will, that you should die first, Maecenas, mighty pride and pillar of my estate. Ah! if any untimely blow snatches you away, you the half of my own life. what care I to stay, the other half, that could not love myself as before, that should not be myself still? That day shall usher in the fall of us both. I have sworn a soldier's oath, and will not break it. We will go, we will go, whensoever you shall lead the way, comrades ready to make the last journey together. For my part, neither the breath of fiery Chimaera nor, could he rise from his chains, the hundred-handed Gyas shall ever tear me from you. So wills it Justice, whose will is law, and the Fates. Whether it be the Balance or the Scorpion that has me under his eye, more stormy presence at the hour of nativity, or Capricorn tyrant of the western waters, the horoscope of us two agrees in a marvellous manner. You the guardianship of Jove, flashing in the face of wicked Saturn, snatched from his power, and stayed the wings of flying fate, what time the crowded people thrice repeated the glad applause in the theatre. Me the tree had slain, falling on my skull, had not Faunus lightened the blow, the guardian of Mercury's favourites. Remember to pay the victims and the shrine you vowed. For myself, I shall slay a humble ewe lamb.

XVIII

Non ebur neque aureum

The general subject is the same as that of the fifteenth Ode—the extravagant growth of the country houses of the rich, with their parks and fishponds; but a new point is added, the cruel eviction of small owners from their properties.

NO ivory nor ceiling of gold glitters in my house :
no slabs of marble from Hymettus lie heavy on columns quarried in utmost Africa. Nor have I found myself, a stranger-heir, in a palace of Attalus¹. Nor do well-born dependants weave for me Laconian purple. But good faith I have, and wit in no niggard vein, and poor as I am, the rich man seeks my friendship. I do not weary the gods for anything more, nor ask any larger boon of a powerful friend, blest abundantly in my single Sabine farm.

Day treads on the heels of day, and new moons wax to wane again. Thou at the threshold of death art contracting for marble pavements and building houses without thought of the grave, and art fain to thrust back further the shore of the sea that breaks on Baiae, not rich enough to thy taste with the coast-line of the mainland. Nay worse, thy next neighbour's landmark again and again thou tearest up, aye, and over the boundaries of thine own clients leapest in thine avarice. Out they go, wife and husband too, carrying in their bosom the household gods of their sires and their ill-clad children. Yet no mansion more certainly awaits the wealthy master than that which is traced out for him by the limit of Orcus, greedy as himself. Why seek anything further? Earth opens her arms impartially to poor man and to prince; and the henchman of Orcus did not ferry back Prometheus for all his cunning or his bribes. He has a prison-house for proud Tantalus and Tantalus' race. He hears and takes his burden from the poor man when his labours are over, when he calls for him, aye, and when he calls not.

¹ See note on p. 25.

XIX

Bacchum in remotis

An imitation probably of a Greek dithyramb. The poet imagines himself to have come on Bacchus among his Satyrs. He describes the effects of the sight, and then finds relief in singing the praises of the god.

I SAW among the rocks far away Bacchus teaching his strains (believe it, after-years!) and Nymphs learning them, and goat-hoofed Satyrs with their pointed ears. Evoe! spare me, O Liber; spare me, awful wielder of the dread thyrsus! It is allowed me to sing of the tireless Thyiads and the running fount of wine and welling streams of milk, and to tell again and again how honey dripped from the hollow wands. It is allowed me to sing of thy consort raised to heaven and her crown set among the stars, and of the home of Pentheus scattered in ruthless ruin, and the destruction of Thracian Lycurgus. Thou turnest the rivers and calmest the barbarian sea. Thou on far hill-tops drenched with wine bindest thy Bacchants' hair in knots of serpents, and takest no harm. Thou, when the impious crew of Titans was clambering up the steep to the Sire's throne, hurledst back Rhoetus with the lion's claws and jaw of terror. And yet they called thee fitter for the dance and jest and play, and said that thou wast not meet for fighting. But thou wast the same in the midst of peace and of war. Thee Cerberus saw, nor harmed thee, adorned with thine horn of gold, but gently wagged his tail, and as thou wentest away licked foot and ankles with his triple tongue.

XX

Non usitata

An Ode chosen for the end of a Book as containing the poet's anticipations of future fame. The best explanation of it seems to be that Horace speaks as from his own death-bed or funeral pile, his friends standing round and Maecenas as chief mourner.

ON no common wing nor weak one shall I mount into the clear air, a poet transformed, nor stay longer on earth, but leave the cities of men, victorious over envy. I shall not die, I the 'child of pauper parents¹,' I whom you are calling by name, beloved Maecenas, nor shall I be bound by the stream of Styx. Even now the skin is roughening and shrinking to my shrinking legs, and above I am changing to a white-plumed bird. The smooth feathers are growing over fingers and shoulders. Presently known more widely than Icarus who had Daedalus to help him, I shall visit the shore of the moaning Bosphorus, and the Gaetolian Syrtes, and the plain beyond the North, a bird of song. The Colchian shall come to know me, and the Dacian who would fain hide his fear of the Marsian cohorts, and the Geloni at the world's end. I shall be the study of the scholarly Spaniard, and of him who drinks the Rhone. Be there no dirge for me, for I shall not be there to bury—no dishonouring grief or lamentation. Check all cries, and let be the meaningless honours of the tomb.

¹ As his rivals named him.

BOOK III

I

Odi profanum

An introduction to a new Book, and to the six stately Odes which are to give its special character to it by setting forth, more definitely than has been done, the moral and social ideals that are to be aimed at by the rule of Augustus. The present Ode paints the existing evils of society. It has lost the sense of proportion : life is spoilt by ambition, greed of wealth, and vulgar ostentation.

I HATE the uninitiate crowd and bid them avaunt.
Listen all in silence ! Strains unheard before I, the Muses' hierophant, now chant to maidens and to boys.

Kings bear rule in awful majesty each over his proper flock ; over kings themselves Jove, in the glory of his triumph over the Titans, moving all creation with his nod. It may be that among his fellow men one plants his lines of vine-props over larger spaces than another ; one, when he comes down into the Campus to ask for votes, has the higher birth ; another rival brings higher character or wider fame, another a larger crowd of clients—by one and the same impartial law Doom assigns the lot of highest and humblest : every name alike is shaken in her roomy urn. The Sicilian tyrant who has a naked sword suspended over his guilty neck will find no taste of sweetness in elaborate banquets : no choir of singing birds or stringed instruments will bring back sleep to him. Sleep, soothing sleep, despises not the low-roofed homes of country folk, or the shady river-bank, or wind-fanned valley. One who desires only what is enough neither stormy sea disquiets nor the fierce violence of setting Arcturus or of the rising Kid: no vineyards battered by the hail, or promise-breaking farm, whose trees now throw the blame on the rains, now on the stars that parch the land, now on the unkind winter. The fishes feel the seas narrowed as pile after pile is flung into the deep. There is the contractor with all his staff busy sinking the stones and rubble, with the servants and the lord himself, to whom life on dry land is not worth living. But Fear and Forebodings clamber up the same way as the lord. Black Care has no awe of brazen trireme, and mounts on the horseman's pillion. But tell me, if when I am in pain neither marble of Phrygia nor the wearing of purples brighter than a star nor Falernian vines and Persian nard can make a pang easier, why should I pile up a lofty palace hall after the new fashion with gates to make the world envious? why should I exchange my Sabine valley for wealth which adds to trouble?

> II

Angustam amice

The old Roman character—endurance, courage, independence, reticence.

A BOY should learn thoroughly the lesson to bear and welcome the restraints of poverty, and should grow hardy in the sharp school of warfare. He should mount his horse and hang on the skirts of the defiant Parthians, and make them dread his spear. He should spend his life under the open heaven and amid scenes of danger. As they see him afar from the foeman's walls, the wife of some warrior king and the maiden ripe for marriage should breathe the sigh, ah ! that the prince of her choice, all new to the battle, may not challenge yon lion so dangerous to rouse, whose passion hurries him through bloodshed where the slaughter is thickest ! To die for fatherland is a sweet thing and a becoming. Death is at the heels even of the runaway, nor spares the haunches and back of the coward and malingerer. Virtue, which cannot know the disgrace of rejection, shines bright with honours that have no stain on them, nor takes nor resigns the rods at the shifting breath of the people's pleasure. Virtue, which opens heaven to those who have deserved something else than death, mounts by a way denied to man, spreads her wings for flight, and spurns the vulgar throng and the dank air of earth.

Loyal reticence too has its reward secure. Who has divulged the sacred secret of Ceres¹, him shall I forbid to stand beneath the same roof or unmoor the frail bark with me. Many a time Jupiter, when men have slighted him, has involved the righteous with the guilty. Rarely has Punishment, though halt of foot, left the track of the criminal in the way before her.

III

Iustum et tenacemFirmness and Justice.

The rule of Augustus is to be resolute. That has been the secret of success to all the heroes of civilization—to the founders as to the refounder of the Roman state. It is also to be moral. This qualification, which occupies the greater part of the Ode, is put in the form of a myth. It was an antecedent condition of Roman greatness that Rome was not to be a second Troy—that is, it was to be free from Asiatic perfidy, luxury, greed. Horace is thinking, no doubt, of what Rome had escaped in avoiding what had come to be the alternative to the rule of Octavianus, viz. the rule of Antony and Cleopatra.

¹ The 'secret of Ceres' is a type of secrets generally.

THE just man and firm of purpose not the heat of fellow citizens clamouring for what is wrong, nor presence of threatening tyrant can shake in his rock-like soul : nor Auster, disorderly ruler of the restless Adriatic, nor the hand of thundering Jove in its might. If the round sky should crack and fall upon him, the wreck will strike him fearless still. This was the art by which Pollux and Hercules the wanderer climbed up and won the starry stronghold, between whom Augustus will take his place and quaff with rosy lips the nectar. It was for deserving by this, Sir, Bacchus, that thy tigers drew thee, bending their stubborn necks to the yoke : it was by this that Quirinus fled safe from Acheron in the chariot of Mars, when Juno had first spoken to the gods in council this welcome word : ‘ Ilium, see, Ilium, one¹ whose judgement was ruinous as wicked and a strange woman¹ have turned to dust the city that was given over for vengeance to me and to chaste Minerva, people and fraudulent prince alike, from the day that Laomedon failed the gods of their promised wage. To-day no longer the guest of evil fame adorns himself for the eyes of his Spartan paramour ; nor has Priam’s perjured

¹ Paris and Helen.

house the aid of Hector to break the onset of the Achaeans' battle. The war prolonged by our differences has sunk to rest. From this day forth my bitter wrath alike and my hated grandson, child of the Trojan priestess,—I will make Mars a present of both. For all that is between us I will permit him to enter the bright abode, to quaff the juices of nectar, and to be enrolled in the quiet ranks of heaven. So long as leagues of stormy sea roll between Ilium and Rome the exiles may reign where they please, and be happy. So long as herds trample on Priam's and on Paris' tomb, and wild beasts hide their whelps there undisturbed, the Capitol may stand in all its glory, and Rome be mighty to impose laws at the sword's point on the humbled Mede. A terror far and near, she may spread her name to furthest shores, where the sundering water divides Europe from the African, where the swelling Nile overflows the fields¹. Only the gold unfound, and so the better placed, be her fortitude shown in despising rather than in gathering with hand that snatches for mortal uses all that is sacred! Whatever bounds have been set to the world, she shall touch them with her arms, and rejoice to go and see in what quarter fiery heat revels unchecked, in what quarter the mists and dews of rain. But the destiny which I promise to the sons of Quirinus I promise on this condition—that never, in mistaken piety or confidence in their own power, they should think to rebuild the homes of their sires at Troy. The fortunes of Troy, if under an evil star it wakes to life again, shall be repeated in a downfall as sad as the last: for I will lead the victorious host, I, the wife of Jove and his sister. 'Three times were the walls to arise in solid brass by Phoebus' building, three times should they perish utterly by the sword of my Argives: three times should wives in slavery mourn for slain husbands and boys.'

¹ i.e. from end to end of the Mediterranean.

This will not suit a mirthful lyre. Whither away, my Muse? Cease in thy wilfulness to repeat the talk of gods and belittle high themes by thy puny strains¹.

IV

Descende caelo

'The rule of Augustus is to be the rule of the Muses — of moderation, refinement, literary culture. Those who still resist it are like the giants trying to overthrow the Olympian gods.'

COME from the sky and give voice on the pipe, O queen Calliope, to a sustained melody—on the pipe, if to-day thou preferrest a higher key; if a lower, on the lyre or Apollo's cithern. Do you hear it? Or is it a delightful madness that makes sport of me? I seem to hear, and to be wandering through haunted groves into which sweet waters stray and sweet breezes.

'Tis ever so: when I was a babe as I lay on Apulian Vultur's side, a truant beyond motherly Apulia's bounds, tired out with play and sleep, the doves of legend covered me with young leaves, to be the marvel of all who dwell in high-nestling Acherontia or in the forest glades of Bantia or on the rich soil of low-lying Forentum, how it could be that I slept, my limbs kept safe from the poisonous vipers and the bears, that I was buried in a heap of sacred bay and myrtle, a brave babe, surely, and some god's special care. Aye, yours, O Muses, ever yours I am, when I am upborne to my Sabine farm in the hills, yours whether cool Praeneste or Tibur on the hillside or Baiae by the clear water has pleased my fancy. Because I was the welcome guest at your fountains and dances, neither the rout at Philippi quenched my light, nor the accursed tree¹, nor Palinurus² in Sicilian waters. So long as ye will be with me I will gladly face the raving Bosphorus on shipboard and the burning sands of the Syrian shore on foot. I will visit the Britons, savage though they be to strangers, and the Concan that revels in horse's blood; I will visit the quivered Geloni and the river of Scythia, and none shall lay hands on me.

¹ 'To dwarf high themes in puny strain.' Conington.

Great Caesar too ye solace when, so soon as he has given retirement in the country towns to his war-wearied cohorts, he seeks repose from his own toils in your Pierian cave. Ye give him gentle counsels, and joy to further them as ye give them, kindly goddesses. We know the tale how with bolt ready to fall he swept away the impious 'Titans' monstrous host, who sways dull earth and windy sea, and orders under one calm rule cities of men and realms of gloom and gods and mortal routs. Mighty terror had they struck to Jove's heart; that band of youths trusting in their forest of arms, and the brothers who strove to leave Pelion set on the top of leafy Olympus. But what should Typhoeus avail, and Mimas for all his strength, or what Porphyryion for his threatening stride, what Rhoetus and Enceladus the bold launcher of upturned trunks, in their rush against the sounding aegis of Pallas? On this side stood eager Vulcan, on that matronly Juno and he that will never lay aside the bow from his shoulder, he that in the pure dew of Castaly bathes his loosened locks, that haunts the thickets of Lycia and the forest of his birth-place, the god of Delos and of Patara, Apollo. Force without mind falls by its own weight. Force under control the gods also advance and further: but the same powers hate strength with all crime stirring in its heart. Be Gyas the hundred-handed witness of my judgements, and Orion known as the assailant of the virgin Diana who fell before her maiden arrow. Earth travails hurled upon the monsters of her own breeding, and bewails her children cast down to lurid Orcus. Neither have the fire's swift flames yet eaten through Aetna that lies on them, nor has the vulture, the warder appointed for his crime, ever left the liver of Tityos the incontinent. Three hundred chains hold fast the lover Pirithous.

¹ See Ode 2. 13.

² The promontory at the southern end of the gulf of Velia. The sea between Italy and the north coast of Sicily was called 'Mare Siculum.' There is no other notice of Horace's escape from shipwreck.

V

Caelo tonantem

The restoration of the old military spirit. Two pictures are contrasted—the disgrace of Carrhae and the heroism of Regulus.

FOR his thunder we have believed that Jove reigns in the sky. Augustus shall prove himself a god on earth by adding to the Empire the Britons and hateful Persians.

Has Crassus' soldier lived on, the disgraced husband of a barbarian wife, and grown old (ah ! for senate changed and old manners overset !) in the ranks of his new kinsmen—a Marsian or Apulian under a king, and him a Mede, forgetful of sacred shields and name and gown and Vesta's undying fire, while Jove's Capitol and Rome still stand ?

This was the fear that was in Regulus' far-seeing soul when he said nay to the base conditions, and traced from the precedent a stream of ruin for the ages to come, if the captives were not left to die as past pity. 'My eyes have seen' he said 'standards nailed up in Punic temples, and armour that had been torn from off soldiers without bloodshed. My eyes have seen citizens, freemen, their arms turned and tied on their backs, and gates no longer closed, and fields which had been laid waste by our war again in tillage. Think you the soldier bought back for gold will come home the braver ? You but add waste to disgrace. The wool once dipped in the dye never regains its lost hue : no more does true valour, when once it has fallen away, care to be replaced in degenerate souls. When the doe that you have set loose from the thick toils shall turn to fight, then will he be a brave soldier who has trusted himself to a treacherous foe, and he will trample on the Carthaginian in a second campaign who has felt the thongs on his close bound arms, the coward ! and has feared to die. The fellow has not known where to owe his life, has confounded peace with war. Oh the disgrace ! O mighty Carthage, lifted higher for the shameful downfall of Italy !' They tell us he put from him, as one disfranchised, his chaste wife and little sons, and fixed grimly on the ground his manly face, till he could brace up the tottering resolve of the Fathers by such counsel as speaker never gave before, and through the ranks of his mourning friends could hasten his departure to his glorious banishment. And yet he knew full well what the barbarian torturer was preparing for him. Yet he moved aside the neighbours in his way and the people that would hinder his return, for all the world as if he were leaving the tedious business of some clients, the suit at last adjudged, for a journey to the fields of Venafrum or to Spartan-built Tarentum.

VI

Delicta maiorum

The restoration of religion and of the sacredness of marriage.

FOR the sins of your sires, albeit you had no hand in them, you must suffer, O Roman, till you have set up again the temples, the falling shrines of the gods and their images foul with sooty smoke. It is because you bow before the gods that you have Lmpire. From them entirely is the beginning of it : to them look for its end. It is the gods, because they have been forgotten, that have showered so many woes on Italy, the home of mourning. Thrice ere now Monaeses and the horde of Pacorus have crushed our onset, for it was unhallowed, and triumph to have added to their petty necklaces spoils taken from us. Our city, while its heart was in civil broils, the Dacian and the Ethiopian wellnigh destroyed—the one a terror for his fleet, the other more skilled in dealing arrows. The ages, fruitful in births of evil, tainted first the marriage state, our blood, our homes. From that fountain-head flowed the stream of ruin on our country and our people. Not from such parents sprang the young generation that dyed the sea with Punic blood and smote Pyrrhus and towering Antiochus and dread Hannibal. They were the manly sons of countrybred soldiers, brought up to turn the soil all day with Sabine mattocks and then cut and carry firewood till a stern mother called ‘enough,’ when the sun was making the mountain shadows fall another way, and relieving the tired bullocks from the yoke and bringing, as his chariot departed, the welcome hour. Destroying time ! what does it not make worse ! Our sires’ age was worse than our grandsires’. We their sons are more worthless than they ; so in our turn we shall give the world a progeny yet more corrupt.

VII

Quid fles, AsterieThe trader's wife.A light piece meant to relieve the seriousness of the preceding Odes. The names are Greek, the life Roman.

WHY tears, Asterie, for one whom with the first days of spring bright skies and gentle winds will bring home to you richly laden with Bithynian wares, that lover of loyal heart, your Gyges? He was driven to Oricus¹ by the south winds that follow the Goat's wild star. There through the winter nights he lies sleepless and weeping many tears. Meantime her messenger tells him how Chloe, his lovesick hostess, sighs and burns (poor heart!) with a passion which belongs only to you, and tempts him in a thousand crafty ways; recounts how Proetus was driven by the false charges of a woman, treacherous as he was credulous, to contrive for Bellerophon an untimely death as a return for his prudery; tells the story of Peleus all but done to death as he fled in his virtue from the arms of Magnesian Hippolyta, and with guileful intent recalls all stories that teach the heart to stray. But it is in vain. Deaf as the rocks of Icarus is the ear he turns to her words, to this hour unscathed. Only do you beware that your neighbour Enipeus find not too much favour in your eyes. Though there be not another as conspicuous as he on the grass of the Campus for skill in guiding a horse, nor one that swims as fast down the Tuscan river, yet at nightfall shut up the house, nor look into the street at the music of the plaintive flute ; and if he call you hard-hearted again and again, remain obdurate still.

¹ A port of Epirus. In winter all sailing was suspended. He has tried to cross late in the season and failed, and so is laid up at Oricus till spring.

> VIII

Martiis caelebs

The first of March. Addressed to Maecenas.

WHAT I can be about, a bachelor¹, on the Calends of March, what these flowers can mean, and censer full of frankincense, and the charcoal laid on the altar of fresh-cut turf, you are wondering, my friend, learned though you are in the lore of either tongue². I had vowed dainty cakes and a white goat to Liber when I was nearly brought to my death by the stroke of the falling tree. This day, as each year comes round, will be a holiday. It will remove the pitch-covered cork from a jar which first was taught to drink the smoke³ when Tullus was consul. Come, Maecenas, a hundred toasts to your friend's preservation ! keep the lights alive till daybreak. No clamour here, no angry passion ! Let be a citizen's cares for the city's weal. Dacian Cotiso's horde is crushed : the Mede has turned on himself in civil strife the weapons which he and no one else will rue : the Cantabrian, our old enemy on the Spanish shore, is our slave, tamed at last to the chain : even the Scythians

¹ The festival of March 1 was the Matronalia.

² i.e. the myths, antiquities, and ritual of Greece and Rome.

³ Wine, to mellow, was placed in an upper chamber through which the flues passed.

have unstrung their bows and think of retiring from their steppes. Be careless for a moment : be a private citizen: spare your anxiety lest in any way the people should take harm. Take the gifts of the present hour and enjoy them. Leave more serious thoughts.

IX

Donec gratus eram

The reconciliation of two lovers.

HE. So long as I found favour in your sight, and no rival preferred to me laid his arms on your white neck, I bloomed in happiness greater than that of the Persian king.

SHE. So long as you felt no other and greater flame, and Lydia was not after Chloe, a proud and famous Lydia I bloomed in glory greater than that of Rome's Ilia.

HE. For me, my queen now is Thracian Chloe, learned in sweet measures and cunning with the cithern. For her I should not fear to die, if fate will spare her dear life to survive me.

SHE. For me, the lover now who kindles in me the answering flame is Calais, son of Ornytus of Thuriæ. For him I would suffer death twice over, if fate will spare my lad to survive me.

HE. What if the old love comes again and brings the divided pair under its yoke of brass—if flaxen-haired Chloe is shaken from her place, and the door opened to offcast Lydia?

SHE. Though fairer than a star is he, you lighter than a cork and more rough-tempered than Hadria in his worst mood, with you I should love to live, with you be ready to die.

X Extremum Tanain

A serenade on a cold night.

IF you drank the waters of Tanais at the world's end, Lyce, the wife of a stern husband, yet you might weep to expose me, stretched at your cruel doors, to the winds which inhabit there. Do you hear how the gates creak, how the trees planted within your fair palace walls groan in the blasts, how the Power of the clear sky freezes the lying snow? Lay down the pride which Venus hates, lest cord snap and wheel run back together. Your sire was a Tuscan—you are no Penelope to rebuff suitors. O lady, though neither gifts nor prayers can bend you, nor lover's face pale with violet stains, nor a husband himself hard hit by that Pierian girl, still spare your suppliants. O harder than the stiff oak, more cruel than Moorish snakes, my back will not for ever endure your threshold and the water of the sky.

XI Mercuri, nam te

Lyde and the Danaids.

OMERCURY, for thou wast the Master whose apt pupil Amphion moved stones by his singing, and thou, O shell, cunning to give back sounds from seven strings, thou that hadst no voice erewhile nor power to please, now art the welcome guest at rich men's tables and in the temples of the gods, teach me some strain to which Lyde will bend her obdurate ear. Now like a three-year-old filly she frolics and frisks in the broad meadow and will let none touch her, unmated as yet and unripe for a husband. Yet thou canst lead tigers and forest trees to follow with thee, and canst stay the course of swift rivers. To thy winning wiles yielded the warder of the dreary palace, Cerberus, albeit a hundred snakes ring his Fury-like head, and foul breath and venomous foam stream from his three-tongued mouth. Aye, and Ixion and Tityos found their faces forced to a smile: the pitcher stood for a moment empty while with thy sweet music thou charmedst the Danaïd maids.

Let Lyde hear those maidens' crime and famous punishment, the vessel that would never fill with the water which emptied itself through the bottom—the doom sure though late which awaits crimes even in the depth of Orcus. The impious maids—for what greater crime could they venture?—the impious maids! They ventured with ruthless steel to slay their bridegrooms. One only of the number worthy of the marriage torch, with glorious falsehood met her sire, a maid famous to all time. 'Arise' she cried to her young bridegroom, 'Arise, lest a hand thou fearest not bring thee too long a sleep! Fly from thy father-in-law and wicked sisters. Like lionesses that have found a herd of calves, they are rending each her own. I have a softer heart than they. As for me, let my sire, if he will, load me with cruel chains because I had mercy, and spared a husband in his piteous hour. Let him banish me on shipboard to the far distant Numidian's land. Go whither thy feet or the sea breezes are waiting to snatch thee away, while night favours thee and Venus. Go, and blessing go with thee, and grave on my tomb my sad tale to keep my name alive.'

XII

Miserarum est

The maiden's dilemma.

Neobule soliloquizes.

POOR maidens! who may neither let love have his way, nor wash away their troubles in sweet wine, under pain of fainting for fear of the lashing of an uncle's tongue¹. Your wool-basket Cythereas' winged boy snatches away: your loom, Neobule, and all your zeal for Minerva's busy tasks the bright beauty of Lipara's Hebrus, when he comes fresh from washing his shoulders from the oil in Tiber's stream—a horseman he better than Bellerophon himself, nor to be vanquished for fault of hand in boxing or of foot in running; skilled too to hit the deer as the frightened herd flies across the open, and quick to receive on the spear-point the boar who skulks in the close thicket.

¹ An 'uncle' in a Roman's mouth represented the censorious disposition in the family circle. Cp. 'don't come the uncle over me,' Sat. 2. 3. 88.

XIII

O fons Bandusiae

The Bandusian spring.

It is written on the eve of the 'Fontanalia.'

O SPRING of Bandusia, more brilliant than glass, right worthy of sweet wine, aye and flowers too, to-morrow shalt thou have the present of a kid whose brow now beginning to sprout with his first horns has presage of love and of battles to come. It is vain; for with his warm red blood he shall dye thy cool streams, the firstling of the wanton flock. On thee the blazing dog-star's hour of fury can lay no hand. Thou hast store of delicious coolness for the bull wearied from the plough and for the strayed sheep. Thou too shalt rank with the fountains of name, for I will be the poet to tell of the holm-oak that crowns the hollow rocks from whence thy waters leap, babbling as they go.

XIV

Herculis ritu

The return of Augustus from Spain.

AFTER the fashion of Hercules, he of whom but now we were speaking, O people, as having gone in quest of the bay-crown which death buys—our Caesar—is coming back to his home-gods a conqueror from the Spanish shore. Let the lady¹ whose one joy is in her husband come forth and do sacrifice to the righteous gods, and the sister² of the glorious chief; and, adorned with the ribbons of suppliants, the mothers of maidens and of sons just returned in safety. For you, young brides and bridegrooms, a truce to words of ill-omen. This day, to my thinking, a true holiday, shall take from us all care. I am not the man to fear tumult or death by violence while the world is in Caesar's holding. Go, boy, seek perfumes and garlands, and a jar that remembers the Marsic war¹, if by chance one crock had the luck to escape the raids of Spartacus¹. Bid sweet-voiced Neaera, too, to make haste and knot her myrrh-scented hair. If any hindrance be made by that odious porter, come away. Whitening hairs soften tempers that loved strife and quarrelling. I should not have borne it in my youth's hot blood when Plancus was consul.

¹ Livia.

² Octavia.

XV

Uxor pauperis Ibyci

An old woman who forgets her age.

In its bitterness of satirical tone the Ode belongs rather to the Epodes.

THE wife of Ibycus, a poor man, put an end once for all—it is full time—to your good-for-nothing ways and scandalous employments. As you come nearer to a not untimely grave, cease to play among the maidens like a flying cloud over bright stars. What becomes Pholoe well enough does not therefore beseem you, Chloris. To storm young men's houses like a Thyiad frenzied by the beating drum suits your daughter better than you. She cannot help gambolling like a young kid for the love of Nothus: you are an old woman. Wool from the famous flocks of Luceria is what becomes your hands—not lutes nor scarlet rose-blooms, nor wine-jars drunk to the dregs.

¹ The references are to the Social war, B.C. 90–88, and the Servile war fifteen years later. It will be noticed that both the instructions to the boy carry an allegorical suggestion: 'We have lived, nationally and individually, out of a time of tumult and hot blood into one of peace and good temper.' The Consulship of Plancus was in the year of Philippi.

XVI

Inclusam Danaen

The power of gold, and the wisdom of moderation in respect of it.

WHEN Danae was in her prison-house, tower of brass and door of oak and surly guard of wakeful watch-dogs had fenced her well enough from nightly paramours, had not Jove and Venus laughed at Acrisius, the frightened jailor of the secluded maiden, because they knew that a path would be found safe and open when the god took the form of offered gold¹. Gold loves to find its way through the midst of bodyguards, and breaks through stone walls with greater force than the lightning stroke. It was for gain that the Argive augur's² house fell, swallowed in a gulf of ruin. It was by gifts that the hero of Macedon³ burst open city gates and sprang mines beneath rival kings. Gifts catch in their meshes fierce sea-captains.

As money grows, care follows it and the hunger for more. I am right in dreading to lift my crest into the world's sight (am I not?), Maecenas, pride of the knights¹. The more a man denies to himself, the more shall he receive from heaven. I strip myself, and join the camp of those who wish for nought, and am fain to fly as a deserter from the side of the wealthy, more proud as the lord of an estate which the world despises than if the saying went of me that I hoarded in my own granaries all the produce of the sturdy Apulian's plough, while I was a pauper in the midst of wealth. A stream of pure water, and a wood a few acres broad, and crops which never break faith with me, are a happier lot than his, little as he thinks it, who glitters in the lordship of fertile Africa². For all that no bees in Calabria are making honey for me, nor wine mellowing in jars at Formiae, nor thick fleeces growing in the pastures of Gaul, yet Poverty never comes to break my peace; nor if I would have more, would you refuse to give it. By narrowing my desires I may better extend my revenues than if I could lay the kingdom of Alyattes to the broad plains of Phrygia. Who ask for much always want much. Well for him to whom God has given with sparing hand, but enough!

¹ Pretium almost = 'hard cash,' or 'a bribe.' Horace means to rationalize the legend.

² Amphiaraus.

³ Philip.

XVII

Aeli vetusto

To Aelius Lamia.

AELIUS, whose nobility is from ancient Lamus³—(since the world has it that it was from him that the Lamiae of old days took their name, and the whole race of their children's children whose memory lives in Fasti, he doubtless is the founder to whom you trace your origin who, history tells us, first ruled the city of Formiae and the Liris where it swims on the shores of Marica¹, a lord of broad realms)—to-morrow a storm descending from the East will strew the forest with a carpet of leaves and the shore with useless seaweed, unless my seer deceives me, the old raven who prophesies rain. Whilst you may, house your wood in the dry. To-morrow you will be treating your genius with wine and a two months' porker, with your household freed from their tasks.

¹ Maecenas had deliberately remained a 'knight,' refusing the honour of the Senate.

² A hyperbolical expression for the owner of vast estates in the corn-growing country of N. Africa.

³ The king of the Laestrygonians in the Odyssey.

➤ XVIII

Faune, Nympharum

Hymn to Faunus.

FAUNUS, as thou pursuest the Nymphs, thy flying loves, through the bounds of my sunny farm pass gently to and fro without harming my little younglings, if the tender kid falls duly in thy honour when the year is full, nor flowing wine is wanting to the bowl, Venus' mate, and the old altar smokes with heaped incense. It is play for cattle of all kinds in the grassy fields when thy day returns, the Nones of December. The village makes holiday, and is free from toil in the meadows, together with the idle ox. The wolf wanders among the lambs and they are not frightened. The forest spreads its rustic carpet for thee. The ditcher rejoices to strike with his foot in triple time his old enemy, the earth.

¹ Marica was a nymph worshipped at Minturnae at the marshy mouth of the Liris (Garigliano).

XIX Quantum distet ab Inacho

The feast in honour of Murena, the new Augur.

HOW great the space from Inachus¹ to Codrus¹, who feared not to die for his country's sake, and all the pedigree of Aeacus, and the tale of the war fought at the gates of sacred Troy, all this you are ready to tell us. What is the cost of a jar of Chian, who is to find the warm water, who offers the house, and at what hour I may hope to be quit of this Pelignian cold—on all this you are silent. A toast, boy, quickly to the new moon—a toast to midnight—a toast to Murena, the new augur! The cups are mixed in proportions to suit the taste, nine ladles to three, or three to nine. The rapt poet, votary of the Muses nine, will ask for thrice three each time. The sister Graces unveiled and hand in hand will fear brawls, and forbid the further three. Mad riot is my humour. Why pause the blasts of the Berecyntian pipe? Why hangs the flute with the lyre silent as itself? For my part I hate grudging hands. Fling about the roses. Let morose Lycus hear the riotous merriment, and our neighbour so ill matched with old Lycus. For you, Telephus, with your thick glossy locks, for you, fair as the clear star of evening, Rhode is looking, as young and as fair. And I am dying in slow fires for love of my Glycera.

¹ Mythical kings of Argos and Athens.

XX

Non vides quantoA battle royal.

DO you not see at what peril you lay hands on the whelps of a lioness of Gaetulia? A few moments more and you will be flying from the unequal combat too craven-hearted for a plunderer, when through the jostling crowd of rivals she shall come to reclaim her chosen Nearchus; and there shall be a battle royal whether the prize is to fall to you rather, or to her. Meantime, while you draw your swift arrows and she sets her formidable teeth, he, they tell me, sits as umpire of the fray, with the palm-branch under his bared foot, and lets the gentle breeze play on his shoulder bespread with his scented locks, fair as Nireus was, or he that was snatched from many-fountained Ida.

XXI

O nata mecumThe power of good wine.Addressed to a jar of wine thirty-five years old.

OBORN with me when Manlius was consul, whether what you bring us be voice of complaint or of mirth, whether strife and blind passionate love, or rather, my gentle wine-jar, sleep that comes at will,—to whatever issue the Massic grapes were gathered whose juice you have in store,—you deserve to be disturbed on a happy day; so come down now that Corvinus bids broach a mellower wine. Think not that he, drenched though he be in Socratic lore, will be Cynic enough to despise you. They say that even old Cato, for all his Stoic virtue, warmed his heart many a time with good wine. You lay on the rack of gentle compulsion the wit at other times stiff and taciturn. You make the wise confess their secret burden of thought in the power of mirth and freedom. You bring hope again to anxious souls, and to the poor strength to lift up his horn. When you have been with him he trembles at the anger neither of crowned kings nor of armed soldiers. Liber and Venus, if she will come with good will, and the Graces slow to loose clasped hands, with night-long lamps shall prolong the revel till the returning god of day routs the stars.

XXII

Montium custos

The dedicated pine-tree.

GUARDIAN of mountains and woodland, O maid who listenest to young wives in their travail, if thrice they call thee, and snatchest them from death, O three-formed goddess, to thee I dedicate the pine-tree which hangs above my farm-house. As each year comes round I shall be fain to honour it with the blood of a young boar just dreaming of his first sidelong thrust.

> XXIII

Caelo supinas

The modest offerings of the humble.

Phidyle's name is chosen to suit the character of a 'thrifty' Sabine housewife.

IF at each new moon you have raised upturned hands to heaven, country-bred Phidyle, if you have propitiated the Lares with frankincense and this year's corn and a greedy little pig, then neither shall your fruit-bearing vine feel the blighting sirocco, nor your crop the barren mildew, nor your sweet younglings the sickly time when the year yields its fruits. The victim already doomed who is now browsing among the oaks and holms on snowy Algidus, or fattening on the herbage of Alba, shall dye at its throat the axe of some pontiff. No business is it of yours to besiege the gods' goodwill with piles of slaughtered sheep, so long as you crown their little images with rosemary and a sprig of myrtle. Though your hand when it is laid on the altar has held no gift, it has softened the displeasure of the Penates with the pious offering of meal and crackling salt, and would please no more with a costly victim.

XXIV

Intactis opulentiorMoral reformation.

The Ode travels over much of the ground of the great Odes at the beginning of the Book.

RICHER than the virgin treasure-houses of the Arabs and of Ind with all its wealth, though you fill with the foundations of your building all the sea on Tuscan and Apulian coasts, yet if Fate have set her hand to drive into the roof-tops her adamantine nails, you will not free your soul from fear or your neck from the noose of death. Better live the Scythians on their steppes, and the hardy Getae, whose acres which rod has never measured bear their produce of corn for the free use of all, nor care they to till for more than one year, and when one has fulfilled his toil a successor relieves him on the same terms of service. There a woman holds her hand from harming her motherless stepchildren, nor does a wife on the strength of her dower overrule her husband or trust the protection of a sleek paramour. Their ample dowry is their parents' worth and a chastity which in the inviolate bond shrinks from touch of any man but one. They may not sin, or if they sin the price is death¹. Ho ! whoso will away with impious bloodshed and the fury of civil strife, if he shall seek to have his name written beneath statues 'the Father of our cities,' let him take heart to put a bridle on the untamed licence of the time, and he shall be glorious to those who are born after us : since (ah, sin and shame !) Worth, while still safely ours, we hate, when lifted from our sight (such is envy) we seek for it in vain. What avail sad complainings, if the sin be not cut off by punishment ? What profit laws, which without lives are empty, if neither the quarter of the world which is fenced in by burning heat, nor the side which neighbours the North wind, with its snows caked hard on the soil, frightens away the trader ; if, though seas are rough, seamen are cunning to overcome them ; and poverty, the one great shame, bids men dare and suffer anything, while it leaves the road which leads up the steep of virtue ? For us, for us, either to the Capitol whither the shouting calls us and the applauding populace, or to the nearest sea, let us convey our gems and precious stones and gold for which we have no use, the occasion of the chief offending, if we are truly tired of our wickednesses. The first lessons of depraved desire must be obliterated, and minds now too soft must be moulded anew in a rougher school. The free-born boy knows not—he has never been taught—how to sit a horse, and is afraid to hunt; he has his lesson better if you should bid him play with the Greek hoop, or, if you like it better, with the dice which the laws forbid: what wonder when his father is busy with his perjured word fooling the partner of his fortunes and his guests, and making haste to gather wealth for an unworthy heir? This is the end of the whole matter: money is shameless. It grows and grows; but the possession is always incomplete: something is for ever wanting.

¹ ' They dare not sin, or if they sin they die.' Conington.

XXV

Quo me, Bacche, rapisA Dithyramb.

WHITHER, O Bacchus, art thou snatching me, filled full with thee? To what woods, what caves, am I carried in the speed, swift as thought, of my new self? In what grots shall my voice be heard as I seek to set Caesar's glory as a star for ever in the skies and at the council-board of Jove? Of something notable is my song, something new, untold before by other tongue. Even as on her mountain-top the sleepless Eviad gazes in rapt astonishment over Hebrus and Thrace glittering with its snows, and Rhodope trodden by savage footsteps, so I wander where I know not, and look with delighted wonder on river-banks and solitary woodland. O Lord of Naiads and of Bacchantes, strong to uproot the tall ash-tree, nothing small or of mean strain, nothing of mere man's utterance¹ may I speak. It is a rapturous peril, O Lord of the wine-press, to follow the god who wreathes his temples with the green vine-shoot.

XXVI

Vixi puellis

An imperfect farewell to old pursuits.

THOUGH that life is past, I was but now still meet for ladies' love, and fought my battles not without glory. Now my armour and the lute, whose campaigns are over, will hang here on yonder wall which guards the left side of Venus of the sea. Here, here lay down the lighted links and crowbars and bow and arrows that threatened the doors which were shut against me. O goddess who dwellest in happy Cyprus and Memphis which knows nothing of Thracian snow, lift high thy lash and give Chloe for her haughtiness one little touch of it.

XXVII

Impios parrae

Galatea and Europa.

LET omen of hooting owl go with the wicked on their way, and bitch in pup and tawny wolf descending from the hill by Lanuvium, or mother vixen. Their journey, ere it is well begun, let serpent break off, darting like an arrow across their path and frightening the ponies. For myself, if I am anxious for any one, I shall use my augury to forestall the future : before the raven with her prophecies of coming storm can fly back to the stagnant pools, I will call her by my prayers to give good omens by her voice from the east. Go and be happy wherever you like best, Galatea, and think sometimes of me. Your journey may neither pie on the left nor restless crow forbid! Yet you see amid what commotion Orion is hasting to his setting: I know myself what the gulf of Hadria is when it blackens, and what the treachery of Iapyx¹ for all his clear skies. May the wives and sons of our enemies feel the dark movements of the rising south, and the blackening water's roaring, and the shores quivering under the lashing surf!

¹ Conington.

It was even so that Europa laid trustfully her snowy side on the cheating bull's back—even so that she saw the water seething with monsters, and the treachery when she was in the thick of it, and paled at the sight, for all her boldness. A moment ago in the meadows hunting for flowers and making the garland she had promised the Nymphs—now in the darkling night she saw nought but stars and heaving water. So soon as she set foot on Crete, the lordly land of a hundred cities, 'My father!' she cried, 'ah! name a daughter has left behind her! ah! childly duty by madness overborne! Whence, whither am I come? Too light a single death for maiden's faults! Am I awake and weeping for a deed shamefully done? Or am I innocent, and is it an empty phantasy that brings a dream from the ivory gate? Whether was it better, to be traversing the weary waves or plucking the fresh flowers? Ah! if one would give to my anger now the accursed bull, I would use all my strength to wound him with steel and break his horns, the monster but now caressed so fondly. 'Twas shameless to leave my father's home. 'Tis shameless to keep death waiting. Oh, of all the gods if one hears me, that I might wander naked among lions! Before the marring hand of decay touch my comely cheeks and the sap withers from the delicate prey, I would my beauty were food for tigers. "Worthless Europa," my father's voice rings in my ear, though he is far away: "why delay you to die? It is easy from yon ash with the kirtle, that has happily come with you, to let swing your neck and break it. Or if the cliff and its rocks set sharp for death please you better, come, trust yourself to the speed of the storm-wind—unless you choose rather to card your portion of wool for a mistress, you the child of kings, and live a concubine at the mercy of a barbarian queen!"' As she wailed, Venus stood by her, with a smile of treachery on her face, and her son with his bow unstrung. Presently when she had enough of play, 'Hold,' she cried, 'from anger and hot words of strife; for the hated bull shall give thee once again his horns to tear at thy will. Thou knowest not that thou art the wedded wife of almighty Jove. Let be thy sobs: learn to bear wisely thy mighty fortune. Half a world shall bear thy name.'

¹ See Od. I. 3: the wind most looked for by those who crossed from Brundisium to Greece.

XXVIII

Festo quid potius dieThe Neptunalia.

WHAT better could I do on Neptune's holiday? Quick, Lyde, bring out from its secret bin the Caecuban, and push the siege of our deep-entrenched seriousness. You see the noonday past its full, and yet as though the flying day were standing still you spare to snatch down from the store-room that loitering jar of Bibulus' consulship. We will sing in turns—of Neptune and the Nereids' sea-green tresses. To your curved lyre you shall sing in answer of Latona and the arrows of flying Cynthia. Ere our singing cease we will remember her who rules Cnidus and the shining Cyclades and visits Paphos on her car of swans. Night too shall find place in the hymn which is her due.

XXIX

Tyrrhena regumTo Maecenas.

Written, as much as the following Ode, for its place at the end of the three Books. It repeats their dedication to Maecenas, and the expression, the more graceful that it is indirect, of affectionate admiration. And it sums up with force and dignity the philosophy of life, such as it is, which under all the irony of form has been at the heart of the Odes. English readers will be familiar with Dryden's noble paraphrase of the Ode.

HAIR of Tuscan kings, all has long been ready for you here—the mellow wine in a jar never tipped yet, with rose-blooms and the oil of the balm-nut pressed specially for your hair. The delay is on your side—snatch yourself from it. Gaze not for ever dreamily on moist Tibur and the upland fields of Aefula and the ridge of the parricide Telegonus. Give the slip to the abundance that only tires, the massy pile that nears the clouds on high : abate for a time your admiration for the smoke and the grandeur and the noise which make the happiness of Rome. Often a change of life has a zest for the rich, and neatly served suppers under the humble roof of the poor, though there be no hangings or purple tapestry, have rubbed wrinkles from the brow of care. Now Andromeda's sire shows brightly forth the fire he hid : now Procyon rages and the sign of the furious Lion, as the sun brings back the days of drought. Now the shepherd makes for the shade and the stream, with his fainting flock, and for the thickets of uncouth Silvanus, and not a breath of wandering wind stirs the quiet of the river-bank. You only are still full of thought what constitution best fits the State, of anxious fears for the City, what the Seres may have in store for us, and Bactra, Cyrus' old realm, and Tanais which has quarrels of its own.

In his good providence God whelms in the darkness of night the issues of the coming time, and laughs if mortal man frets himself beyond the just limit. What is at your hand be mindful to order with equal mind. All else is like the course of a river, that now runs peacefully between its banks to the Tuscan sea ; presently is whirling wave-worn boulders and upturned trunks and cattle and homesteads all together amid the echoing of the hills and neighbouring forests, when a wild deluge wakes to frenzy quiet streams. He will through life be master of himself and a happy man who from day to day can have said, 'I have lived: to-morrow the Sire may fill the sky with black clouds or with cloudless sunshine; he will not undo aught that is left behind me, nor change or make as though it had not been aught that the hour, fast as it flies, has once brought.' Fortune, who joys in her cruel business, nor ever tires of her tyrannous sport, shifts from one to another her fickle honours, now bounteous to one, now to some one else. While she stays I praise her: if she shakes her pinions for flight I return all she gave, and wrap myself in my own virtue, and seek the hand of honest, undowered Poverty. It is not my way, if my mast groan in African storm-winds, to fall to abject prayer and bargain in vows that my wares of Cyprus or Tyre may not add their wealth to the greedy sea. In that hour, safe in the guardianship of my two-oared shallop, I shall be carried through the turmoil of the Aegean by the wind and Pollux, the twin brother.

> XXX

Exegi monumentum

The Epilogue.

MY work is done, the memorial more enduring than brass and loftier than the kingly building of the pyramids—something that neither the corroding rain nor the wild rage of Aquilo can ever destroy, nor the numberless succession of years and flight of ages. I shall not all die: a large part of me will escape the Funeral-queen. I shall grow for ever, fresh in the praise of the aftertime, as long as pontiff with silent maid shall climb the Capitol. I shall be spoken of as one who, where Aufidus is rough and loud, where Daunus in a thirsty land ruled over his rustic tribes, rose from humility to greatness, and was first to find a home among Italian measures for the lyric poetry of Aeolia. Assume the proud place thy deserts have won, and crown, of thy grace, my locks, Melpomene, with the Delphic bay.

BOOK IV

[It will be remembered that this Book was added after a considerable interval, during which Horace had laid aside lyric composition. Several attempts had been made, as we gather from Epist. 1. 1 and 2. 2, to induce him to resume it. In B.C. 17 he was appointed to write the hymn for the Secular Games, with which the sixth Ode of this Book connects itself; and eventually he yielded to the personal desire of Augustus that he should celebrate the victories of his stepsons, Tiberius and Drusus, which occupy the fourth and fourteenth Odes. To these are added Odes 5 and 15, to give Augustus himself his proper place.

The first three Odes form together an apologetic prelude to the Book.]

I

Intermissa, Venus

Two purposes are on the face of the Ode: (1) to form a link with the preceding Books by the reference back both to 1. 19, the first of the love-poems, and to 3. 20, in which Horace had declared his love-campaigns to be at an end; (2) to suggest with characteristic irony that the purpose of the resumption of lyric poetry is only to write more love-songs.

WHAT, Venus, dost thou wake again the war after long truce? Spare me, I pray, spare me.
I am other than I was when poor Cinara¹ was queen.

¹ Cinara is the one female name of Horace's Odes to which something more than a shadowy existence seems to be given by his references to it in his other writings (Epist. 1. 7 and 14).

Try no more, 'imperious mother of sweet loves¹,' to bend to thy soft behests a heart which nigh on ten lustres² have hardened. Get thee gone whither the coaxing prayers of young voices are calling thee back. It will be more timely to lead the revel on thy winged car of lustrous swans to the home of Paulus Maximus, if thou seekest to fire a fitting heart. For he is high-born, and he is handsome, and no tongue-tied champion of trembling prisoners at the bar. The young hero of a hundred accomplishments, he will bear far abroad the standards of thy warfare. And so soon as he has laughed triumphant over the gifts of a large-handed rival, he will make thee stand in marble near the lakes of Alba under a roof-tree of cedar-wood. There thy nostrils shall drink clouds of frankincense, and thou shalt delight thyself with the mingled strains of lyre and Bercyntian flute and pipe besides. There twice each day boys and tender maids shall praise thy deity and beat the ground with their white feet in triple measure after Salian³ wont. For me, no fond hope of answering heart, no drinking-bout has charms, nor fresh flowers to bind my brow. But ha! what is this? Why, Ligurine, why steals once and again the tear down my cheeks? why, when I would speak, falters in awkward silence my voice of ready utterance?

¹ A line purposely repeated from the beginning of Od. 1. 19.

² Horace was fifty in the December of B.C. 15.

³ See note on p. 58.

In dreams of the night now I have caught thee, now
I am following thee as thou fliest thee down the grassy Campus Martius, hard heart, thee down the rolling river.

II

Pindarum quisquis

To Iulus Antonius, son of the Triumvir, and eventually the husband of Octavia, the niece of Augustus.

Like 1. 6 and 2. 12 it is an Ode in professed deprecation of the task set him. 'Not I, but you. I am no Pindar to write Odes about great victories. I can only shout with the crowd.'

WHOSO would rival Pindar, Iulus, is poising himself on wings that some Daedalus has fastened for him with wax, and will give his name to some glassy sea. Like a stream down a mountain-side, when storms have swollen it above its wonted banks, Pindar boils and rushes in a flood of deep-mouthed utterance. Apollo's bay must be his, whether¹ through the daring dithyramb he roll his novel words as he pours along in lawless rhythms; or sing of gods and kings, the children of gods, by whose hands fell the Centaurs in well-earned death, fell the terrors of the fiery Chimaera; or tell of those whom the palm of Elis sends to their home very denizens of heaven, boxer or charioteer, and so give them a gift better than a hundred statues; or bewail the young husband snatched from his weeping bride, and lift to the stars strength and courage and life all golden, which he grudges to see the prey of black Orcus. Strong are the winds, Antonius, that upbear the swan of Dirce¹ as oft as he soars into the cloudy spaces. For me, after the fashion of a Matinee bee, that through incessant toil makes boot² upon the fragrant thyme about the woods and river-banks of streaming Tibur, I humbly build my laborious verse. You, a poet of loftier quill, shall sing of Caesar by-and-by when he shall drag along the sacred hill the fierce Sygambri, his brow decked with the well-earned bay-leaf. No greater or better gift than him have the fates and the good gods given to the world—no, nor will give, even though the times go back to the gold of the first age. You shall sing of the days of joy, Rome's common holiday, in honour of the return of the gallant Augustus granted to our prayers, and the courts empty of suitors. Then my voice too, if aught I can say merits hearing, shall add its part ungrudgingly, and 'O fair, O glorious day!' I will sing, in the delight of having received Caesar home again. And for you, as you go in the procession ('Ho! Triumph!' again and again, 'Ho! Triumph!' will we cry, the whole city, as we offer frankincense to the kind gods), ten bulls and as many cows will be your discharge; mine a tender calf just weaned which is fattening in the rich pastures to pay my vow, on whose brow is the resemblance of the crescent brightness of the moon on her third day's rising, there, where the mark is, snowy white to the eye, the rest all red.

¹ The following lines characterize the different kinds of Pindar's poems.

¹ The famous fountain at Thebes, Pindar's home.

² the honey-bees . . .

Make boot upon the summer's velvet buds.

Henry V, Act I. Sc. 2.

III

Quem tu, MelpomeneThe Poet's calling.Confidence is represented as returning to him in the thought of his poetic calling and its recognition in Rome.

ON whom thou, Melpomene, hast cast once for all in his birth-hour thy kindly glance, for him no Isthmian training shall win renown as a boxer, no spirited horse shall drag him in Grecian car of victory, nor war's business display him crowned with Apollo's bay to the Capitol as having crushed the vaunting threats of kings. But the waters that flow past green Tibur and the tangled tresses of the forest shall mould him to win a name in Aeolian song. The sons of Rome, the queen of cities, deign to place me among the sweet choirs of poets; and now less fiercely bites the tooth of envy. O Pierian maid, who rulest the dulcet sounds of the golden shell, O lady, that couldst give, if so thou pleasedst, to the dumb fishes the notes of the swan, it is all of thy free gift that the finger of the passer-by points me out as the tuner of a Roman lyre. Breath of song and power to please, if please I may, are alike of thee.

IV

Qualem ministrumThe Victory of Drusus.

Drusus, the younger of the two sons of Livia by her former husband, Tiberius Claudius Nero, had defeated the tribes in the neighbourhood of the Brenner pass (see Merivale's Roman Empire, vol. iv, ch. 35). Horace attributes his prowess to the blood of the Neros and to his bringing up in the home of Augustus. The glory of the house of Nero is summed up in the victory won by C. Claudius Nero over Hasdrubal at the river Metaurus in B.C. 207, the turning-point of the second Punic war.

SUCH as the winged bearer of the thunderbolt, to whom the king of the gods granted to be king over the fowls of the air when on golden-haired Ganymede he had proved him faithful; whom erewhile his young blood and the force of his race drove forth from the eyrie when yet he knew not life's labours, then the spring-breezes, when the storms had cleared, teach his timorous wings their first strange efforts; soon with lightning-rush he is swooping as a foe on the unresisting sheepfolds; presently his thirst for the feast and the fight is driving him on the serpents who will struggle hard—or such as the lion fresh weaned from his tawny dam whom a kid, her whole heart in the rich pasture, looks up and sees, a moment before she dies by his unfleshed tooth—just such seemed Drusus to the Vindelici of Raetia when they saw him waging war beneath their Alpine heights. Whence comes through immemorial time the custom that arms their hands in war with Amazonian axe, I have not found time to inquire—man cannot know all things. Be that as it may, their hosts, long victorious over all the countryside, were vanquished in their turn by the young hero's skill, and learned to know what is the force of a mind and heart duly nurtured in heaven-blest homes, of the fatherly care of an Augustus for young Neros.

Gallant sons spring from the gallant and good. Good blood tells even in bullocks and horses, nor do bold eagles breed the timid dove. But teaching quickens the native power and right training fortifies the heart. If ever it be that the public manners fail, faults discredit even the nobly born. How great thy debt, O Rome, to the house of Nero, witness Metaurus' stream and routed Hasdrubal and that fair day which scattered the darkness of Latium, the first day that smiled with Victory's cheer from the time when the dread African first rode his foray through the towns of Italy like flame through a pine-forest or the east wind across Sicilian waters. From this day forth the young strength of Rome grew in ever more victorious efforts, and the shrines desolated by the sacrilege of Punic invaders saw their gods once more on their pedestals; till at last false Hannibal outspoke, 'Weak deer, the doomed prey of robber wolves, we venture to assail those from whom to steal away were a rare triumph. That race which, sprung from the fires of Ilium, through the tossing of Tuscan waters bore safely its sacred treasures, its sons and aged sires, home to Ausonian cities, like the holm-oak shorn by ruthless axes on Algidus where black leaves grow thick, through loss, through havoc, from the very edge of the steel draws new strength and heart. Not more persistently, when he lopped its limbs, the Hydra grew sound again in face of Hercules, chafing at the foil¹; not stranger portent did the soil of Colchis breed, or Thebes in Echion's day. Plunge it in the depth—it comes forth the fairer. Close with it—mid loud applause it will lay low its conqueror, though his powers were still unbroken, and will wage a war for wives to tell of. 'Not to-day can I send proud messages home to Carthage. Fallen, fallen is all our hope and the fortune of our name in the death of Hasdrubal.'

¹ From Conington.

There is nothing that Claudian hands cannot perform, when Jove with his kindly blessing protects them, and a wise providence guides their way through the rocky channels of war.

V

Divis orte bonisThe absence of Augustus.

Augustus left Rome in the autumn of B. C. 16 in consequence of a serious defeat of Lollius by the Sygambri, a tribe living on the Rhine. The barbarians on the approach of reinforcements made peace, but Augustus remained in Gaul till the summer of B. C. 13.

O BORN in an hour when the gods were good, best guardian of the race of Romulus, thou art absent already too long. Thou didst promise the sacred conclave of the Fathers a speedy return—keep now thy promise. Give back the light, dear chief, to thy country. For, like spring-tide, when thy presence has shone upon thy people the days pass more pleasantly and the suns beam more brightly. As a mother for her boy whom the south wind's unkindly blast keeps lingering beyond the waters of the Carpathian sea far from his dear home past the term of his yearly absence—with vows and omens asked and prayer she calls for him, nor can shift her eyes from the windings of the shore—so for Caesar longs his country, smitten with loyal yearning. For in conscious safety now the ox stalks about the countryside, the countryside that Ceres nurtures and kindly Plenty. Sailors fly to and fro across the seas now at peace. Faith shrinks from breath of blame. Purity of home is never stained by deeds of shame. Habit and law have vanquished the taint of vice. The sire's likeness in her babe's face is the mother's glory. Punishment follows close on the heels of crime. Who now would fear Parthian or frozen Scythian, who the teeming brood of rough German forests, while Caesar still is ours, or give a thought to fierce Hiberia's warriors? On his own hillside each sees the sun down as he is wedding the vine to long-widowed trees, and then goes home to the wine-cup with glad heart, and when the cloth is drawn invokes thy name among the gods. To thee he prays often, to thee pours the libation, ranks thy power divine among the gods of his hearth, even as Greece in her pious memory of Castor and mighty Hercules. Long be the happy time of holiday, dear chief, that thou grantest to Italy. So say we in the sober morning before the day begins, and say again at mellow evening when the sun has sunk under the sea.

VI

Dive, quem proles

To Apollo.

An invocation to the God of Greek poetry, the God to whom Rome owed her existence, to help the poet in the composition of the hymn which he has been selected to prepare for the Secular Games.

O GOD, whose hand Niobe's children knew in the punishment of a vaunting tongue, and Tityos the ravisher, and Phthian Achilles, stayed in the moment of victory over lofty Troy; a greater warrior than all else, but no match for thee, though he was the son of the sea-nymph Thetis and made the Dardan towers quake before the repeated onset of his terrible spear. Like a pine smitten by the biting steel, or a cypress under the force of the east wind, he bowed and fell at all his length and laid his neck in Trojan dust. He was not one to lurk within a horse that falsely feigned Minerva's rites, and surprise the Trojans in the midst of foolish merrymaking and Priam's palace when it was blithe with dancing. His foes were taken in open day; but his heavy hand (ah, horror!) had burnt in Grecian flames lisping children and the babe yet in its mother's womb, had not the Sire of gods, won by thy voice and kindly Venus, pledged to Aeneas walls to be built under happier omens. Oh, thou that taughtest Thalia her sweet voice and lyric music, Phoebus, that lavest thy locks in Xanthus' river, protect the honour of a Daunian Muse, O young Agyieus¹! Yes—'tis Phoebus that has given me the breath and the art of song and the poet's name. O flower of maidens and boys sprung from noble sires, wards of the Delian goddess who stays with her bow the flying lynxes and the deer, come, keep the measure of Lesbos to the time of my thumb, singing in due course of Latona's boy, in due course of her who lights the night with crescent lamp, that prospers the fruits of earth and speeds the rolling months on their way. Some day, when you are a wedded wife, you shall say, 'I too to please the gods, when the Secular holiday came round, performed the hymn and learned well the measure of the poet Horace.'

¹ A Greek name of Apollo.

VII

Diffugere nivesSpring lessons.

The line of thought is the same as that of Od. 1. 4.

THE snows have scattered and fled; already the grass comes again in the fields and the leaves on the trees. Change passes on the dry land, and the rivers dwindle and flow within their banks. The Grace with the Nymphs and her own twin sisters ventures unrobed to lead the dance. That you hope for nothing to last for ever, is the lesson of the revolving year and of the flight of time which snatches from us the sunny days. Cold softens before the Zephyrs. Advancing summer tramples spring before it, to die itself so soon as apple-laden autumn has emptied its store of fruits: and then dull winter rolls round again. Yet change and loss in the heavens the swift moons make up again. For us, when we have descended where is father Aeneas, where are rich old Tullus and Ancus, we are but some dust and a shadow. Who knows whether the gods' will be to add to-morrow's hours to the sum as it stands to-day? That will all of it escape the greedy hands of your heir which you have given to your own dear soul. When once you are dead and Minos has passed on you the doom of his august tribunal, no high blood, Torquatus, no eloquent tongue nor piety, will reinstate you. For neither does Diana set free from the darkness of Hades Hippolytus the chaste, nor can Theseus break the chains of Lethe from off his dear Pirithous.

VIII

Donarem pateras

The 'deathless powers' that 'to verse belong.'

I WOULD send to my friends goblets and nice bronzes, Censorinus, to suit their taste, I would send tripods, the prizes of Greek heroes, and you should have the best of my presents, if I were rich, you understand, in works of art such as Parrhasius gave to the world, or Scopas, masters in representing now a man, now a god, the one of them in marble, the other in liquid colours. But my force lies not there; nor are yours the circumstances or the taste that you should desire such dainty gifts. Verse is what you love, and verse is what I can offer, and tell you the value of the gift. Not marbles engraved with inscriptions by order of the State, which give breath of life to dead captains of good service—a second breath of life—not the swift flight of Hannibal and his threats flung back in his teeth, not the flames of sacrilegious Carthage, show forth more brilliantly the praises of him who came home with a name won from the conquest of Africa, than do the muses of Calabria. If the poet's page should be silent of your good deeds you will miss your reward. What should we know of the son of Ilia and Mars, if churlish silence shrouded Romulus' great deeds? 'Tis by his virtue—yes, and by the goodwill and by the tongue of poets, to whom that power belongs—that Aeacus was rescued from the waves of Styx, and blest in the happy islands. The hero who is worthy of her praise the Muse will not let die,—the Muse makes happy in heaven. That is how the strenuous Hercules attained his wish and is a guest at Jove's table; how the sons of Tyndarus, as a star of light, rescue shattered barks from the depths of the sea; how Liber, his temples wreathed with the green vine-shoot, guides his votaries to happy issues.

IX

Ne forte credas

What the lyric poet can and will do for Lollius.

THAT you believe not, as mayhap you do, the words must needs die which, by art till now a secret, I speak, whose birthplace was by far-sounding Aufidus, words to be wedded to the lyre-strings, bethink you that, if Maconian Homer holds the first place, this does not mean that Pindar's verse is lost to sight or that of Ceos¹, Alcaeus' threatening or Stesichorus' stately Muse. Nor has time blotted out a playful line of Anacreon's. Still breathes the love, still lives the passion, which were told as secrets to her strings² by the Aeolian maid. Homer's Helen is not the only woman that was ever fired by a lover's smooth locks, or admired gold-bespangled robes and kinglike adornments and train of followers. Nor was Teucer the first to send arrows straight from Cretan bow. Not once only was an Ilium besieged. Huge Idomeneus and

¹ i.e. of Simonides.

² From Conington.

Sthenelus were not the only heroes who ever fought battles worth the Muse's telling. Hector the defiant and keen Deiphobus were not the first to meet rough blows in defence of chaste wife and boys. Gallant heroes lived before Agamemnon, not a few: but on all alike, unwept and unknown, eternal night lies heavy because they lack a sacred poet. When they are in the grave the difference is little between cowardice and valour, if they be hidden. I do not mean to leave you in silence unadorned by my pages, Lollius, nor to allow all your strenuous life to be the prey of envious oblivion. A soul you have of foresight, that holds its balance in times of success and of doubt, quick to punish greed and wrong, and proof against the charms of money which tempts all the world—the soul of one who has been consul not in a single year, but so often as, on a judgement-seat, generous and leal he has set honour before expediency, has flung back with lofty mien the gifts of the guilty, has carried his arms victoriously through opposing hosts. It is not the possessor of many things whom you will rightly call happy. The name of the happy man is claimed more justly by him who has learnt the art wisely to use what the gods give, and who can endure the hardships of poverty, who dreads disgrace as something worse than death. He will not fear to die for the friends he loves, or for his country.

XI

Est mihi nonumMaecenas' birthday.

This is the only recognition of Maecenas in this Book. The old regard is still existent, but Maecenas is no longer the prominent figure he was when the first three Books were written. He is out of favour with Augustus, and Horace has a more independent position.

HERE I have a jarful of Alban more than nine years old; here in my garden, Phyllis, is parsley for twining garlands, is good store of ivy, to be the bright adornment of your knotted hair. The house gleams cheerily with silver: the altar ready bound with sacred boughs waits eagerly for the sprinkling of the slain lamb's blood. All the household is astir, the mixed throng of boys and girls is bustling to and fro. The very flame is in a tremble as it rolls up in whirling column of dingy smoke. That you may understand all this time to what merrymaking it is that you are bidden, know that you must keep the Ides, the day that halves sea-born Venus' month of April, by good right to me a holiday and more sacred almost than my own birthday, for that from its shining my Maecenas dates the years as they add themselves to his tale. Telephus, on whom your heart is set, is no youth of your degree and another has forestalled you, one rich and of manners free, and holds him fast in chains which he hugs. Scorched Phaethon's doom should scare us from too greedy day-dreams; and winged Pegasus, that could not brook Bellerophon his earth-born rider, gives stern lesson that you pursue always what befits you, and, by counting it sin to hope beyond what is allowed, avoid an ill match. Come now, last of my loves—for never again shall my heart take fire at woman's face—come, learn well the melody which thy sweet voice is to render. Black care will grow less as we sing.

XII

Iam veris comites

An invitation to Vergilius (not the poet).

NOW spring's companions that make calm the sea, the breezes from Thrace, are swelling the sails: the meadows no more are hard frozen nor the streams roaring, swollen with winter's snow. Now lays her nest, making sad moan for Itys, the unhappy bird, the eternal shame of Cecrops' palace for her ill revenge on barbarian princes' crime. Now they that tend the fattening sheep in the soft young grass discourse music on the pipe, and pleasure the god who loves the flocks and black hills of Arcadia. The year has brought the thirsty time, Vergilius; but if you fain would quaff Liber's juices from the press of Cales, O client of noble youths, you shall earn your wine with some nard. One little box of nard shall coax forth a jar which now lies resting in the Sulpician stores, the generous giver of new hopes and the power that washes all their bitterness out of cares. If such delights make your mouth water, come quick with the wares that you are to bring. I have no mind to let you see the bottom of my cups and not pay your share, as if I were a rich host in a house of abundance. Away with excuses and covetous thoughts: now while you may, remember the black funeral fires, and mix with your sage counsels some brief folly. In due place to forget one's wisdom is sweet.

XIII

Audivere, LyceRevenge.

Like the first Ode, this is a sequel, taking up the imagined story of 3. 10 in which he complained of Lyce's high airs. This may exempt us from the necessity of supposing that the situation is more than an imaginary one.

THE gods have heard, Lyce—Lyce, the gods have heard my prayers. You are turning into an old woman and yet you are wishing to be thought beautiful, and you play and you drink without shame, and in your cups you appeal with your trembling ditties to the inattentive ears of the young god of love. His sentry-post is on the fair cheeks of Chia, still in the green leaf and skilled with the cittern. Aye he flies without ruth past the sere oak trees: he will have nothing to say to you, disfigured by the blackened teeth, by the wrinkles and snows of age. No purple gauzes of Cos, no precious jewels bring back the days of old, when once flying time has prisoned them in calendars which all can read. Whither has fled the charm, whither—ah me!—the tints, whither the graceful movement? What have you left of her, of her whom I remember, in whose breath was love, who had stolen me from myself, that face, next only to Cinara, divine, so well known, so full of winsome wiles? But to Cinara the fates gave short years, while Lyce they meant to keep long alive, to match the times of an ancient crow, that young men with their hearts still warm might gaze and laugh at the torch burnt down into a heap of ashes.

XIV

Quae cura patrumThe victorious campaign of Tiberius.

HOW can Senate or Roman people by largess of honours ample enough immortalize in graven titles or records for all time virtues such as thine, Augustus—O thou, in all the space over which the sun lights coasts where men can dwell, greatest of princes! What thy might in war, the Vindelici have just learnt, who had never known the rule of Latium before. For thine was the soldiery with which Drusus by his vigorous onset repaid with heavy interest the Genauni, that turbulent race, and the fleet Breuni, and flung their fortresses down their terrible Alpine heights. Soon the elder of the Nero brothers joined shock of battle, and under a happy star drove in rout the giant Rhaetians. A brave sight he was in Mars' contests, for the mighty earthquake-shocks with which he shook that line of breasts that offered themselves so readily to a freeman's death (much as Auster drives, but cannot tame, the waves, what time the dancing Pleiads are shining through torn clouds), unwearied in assailing the foeman's squadrons and setting his foaming charger through the midst of the fires. Even so rolls down bull-like Aufidus, who skirts the realm of Apulian Daunus, when he grows furious and plans dread deluge for the well-tilled lowlands, as Claudius by his devastating onset laid in ruins the steel-clad lines, mowing down the first rank and the last, like corn before the reaper, a conqueror without cost of blood. And it was thou that gavest the force, that gavest the plan, and gods all thine own. Aye, it was for thee that on the self-same day that Alexandria on her knees had opened to thee her port and empty palaces, prosperous fortune, five lustres after, crowned the war with success and claimed one more glory, one envied laurel to thy past campaigns. To thee the Cantabrian who could never be tamed before, and Mede and Indian, to thee the Scythian of the steppe, look with awe. O present guardian of Italy and of Rome, the queen of the world, thee Nilus, who keeps secret the springs of his waters, and Ister, thee rushing Tigris, thee the monster-teeming Ocean that roars round distant Britain, thee the Gauls, fearless of death, and hard Hiberia's land, obey. The Sygambri, whose joy is in bloodshed, lay to rest their arms, and worship thee.

XV

Phoebus volentem

The rule of Augustus.

An Epilogue to the Book, the final answer to Augustus' request.

'TWAS Phoebus who, when I was thinking to tell of battles and conquered cities, thundered at me on his lyre and bade me not set my puny sail across a Tuscan sea. Thine age, Caesar, has brought back plenteous crops to our fields, and to our own Jove has restored the standards plucked down from the proud portals of the Parthian, and has closed the gate of Ianus Quirinus, for the war was over, and has put a bridle in the mouth of licence that would stray beyond right order, and has banished vices and recalled the old ways of life through which the name of Latium and the strength of Italy grew, and the majesty of the empire was spread to the sun's rising from his bedchamber in the west. While Caesar guards the world, no civil madness or violence shall banish peace, no anger which forges swords and sets at variance wretched cities. Neither those who drink the deep Danube shall break the edicts of the Julian house, nor Getae nor Seres nor faithless Persians, nor those whose birthplace is by the river Tanais. And for ourselves, on working days and on holidays, amid the bounty of mirthful Liber, with our children and our wives, when we have duly prayed to the gods, with song accompanied by Lydian pipes we will sing after our fathers' fashion of chiefs who have lived their lives like true men, and of Troy and of Anchises, and of the offspring of kindly Venus.

THE SECULAR HYMN

Phoebe, silvarumque

In the Museo Nazionale at Rome there are some fragments of a column pieced together which were dug up in the year 1890 near the Tiber during the formation of the new embankment. The inscription upon them gives an account of the celebration of the Secular Games by Augustus in the year B.C. 17. According to this, sacrifices were offered by the Emperor in person on three successive nights to 'the Fates, the Ilithyiae, and Mother Earth,' and on three successive days to Jupiter and Juno on the Capitoline and to Apollo and Diana on the Palatine. On the last day, when the sacrifice was finished, twenty-seven boys and the same number of girls sang a hymn, and it is added that the 'hymn was composed by Quintus Horatius Flaccus.'

It was to be sung both on the Palatine and on the Capitoline. It is mainly addressed to Apollo and Diana, but it gathers up the ideas of the whole celebration.

PHOEBUS, and queen of the woodland, Diana, Plucent glory of the heavens, to be honoured even as ye have been honoured in all time, grant ye now what we ask at this sacred season, at which the Sibyl's verses have taught us that maids and boys, chosen and chaste, should sing a hymn to the gods who have loved well
the Seven Hills.

O life-giving Sun, that with thy chariot of light bringest forth and hidest away the day, and art ever born anew other and yet the same, mayest thou never find aught to look on mightier than Rome city!

O thou whose gentle hand, after thine office, can open the way for the birth when the ripe hour is come, guard, Ilithyia, our wives and mothers, whether 'the Bright One' be the name thou lovest to hear, or 'the Mother of life.' O goddess, nurture our children, prosper the Fathers' decrees on the marriage yoke and the law of wedlock, that is to be the fruitful seed of a young generation! So without fail the revolution of ten times eleven years shall bring back the songs and games that gather crowds thrice in the bright daytime and as often in the pleasant night hours.

And ye, Parcae, whose song is truth, as once and for aye has been promised (and Time's landmark, that may not be removed, protect the promise!), link happy destinies to those already accomplished. May Earth, bounteous in increase of fruits and of cattle, dower Ceres with garlanded corn-ears: may wholesome waters and Jove's breezes nurture all that grows from her!

Listen with gentle heart and kindly, thy quiver closed, to the boys' prayer, Apollo! Queen of the stars, with horned brow, listen, Moon-goddess, to the girls! If Rome is of your handiwork, if from Ilium came the cohorts that settled on the Tuscan shore, a remnant bidden to find a new home and city after a heaven-directed wandering, for whom, uninjured through the fires of Troy, clean-handed Aeneas, saved alive when his country perished, found safe and free passage on his way to give them more than all they left behind—then grant, Powers Divine, to youth teachable hearts and honest lives, grant to old age peace and rest, grant to Romulus' race wealth and increase and all that is bright and happy ; aye, and what with sacrifice of white oxen the glorious son of Anchises, Venus' lineage, prays of you, may he win, ever master of the fighting foeman, ever gentle to the vanquished !

Already the Mede trembles at the arms puissant by sea and land and the rods that came from Alba : already the Scythian asks as of an oracle our bidding, and the Indian a moment ago so proud : already Good Faith and Peace and Honour, and the Modesty of old days, and Virtue long dishonoured, take heart to return, and Plenty with the blessings of her full horn is seen amongst us. Phoebus, the Seer, whose adornment is the shining bow, the welcome friend of the nine Muses, who with his art of health brings relief to the body's heavy-laden limbs, as surely as he looks with kindly eye upon his altar on the Palatine, bids advance Rome's greatness and the happiness of Latium for another lustre and for ages that grow ever better. And the goddess who owns the Aventine and Algidus, Diana attends to the prayers of the Fifteen¹ and lends friendly ears to the vows of the young choir.

That this is the will of Jove and of all the gods, good hope and sure we carry home, we the chorus that have learnt to sing the praises of Phoebus and Diana.

¹ The Commission whose business it was to arrange for the Secular Games and the rites belonging to them.

EPODES

[THE name 'Epodes' was given to these poems by the Latin grammatical and metrical writers, and meant properly couplets consisting of a longer and a shorter verse. Horace's own name for them was 'Iambi,' which not only described their metre, but also their character; for the metre itself had been named from its use by Archilochus and others in the poetry of invective.

They are amongst Horace's earlier poems.]

I

Ibis Liburnis

Before the battle of Actium. Maecenas is expecting to go and Horace protests that he will go too. Whether they really went is not quite certain. (See Epode 9 and Introd. p. 18.)

SO you will go, dear friend Maecenas, in the light galleys among the ships' towering bulwarks, with your heart set to meet at peril to yourself every peril that awaits Caesar. And what shall we do? we to whom life, if it be while you live too, is a delight, if otherwise, a burden. Say, shall we obey you and live on in ease, ease which has no charm save in your company; or face this toil, and bear it with the soul with which heroes should? We will bear it, and in your train, whether over Alpine ridges or the unharboured¹ Caucasus, or even to the furthest gulf of the West, we will follow with staunch hearts. Would you ask how with my poor efforts I could second such as you, no warrior

¹ See note on p. 46.

I, nor man of might? If I am with you, I shall be less in fear. Fear haunts us with more power when we are apart. Even as a bird, when she is sitting on a callow brood, fears more for them the sliding serpent's approach if she have left them; though, for all her presence, she could give no whit more aid if they were by her. Gladly will I fight through this campaign and every other for the hope of your favour—not that ploughs may struggle behind more teams of bullocks on my land, or my cattle move from Calabrian to Lucanian pastures before the dog-star's heat, nor that I may have a shining white villa close on the Circean¹ walls of Tusculum on its hill. Enough and to spare, your bounty has enriched me already. Far be it from me to gather in order to bury the hoard in the earth like a miserly Chremes², or to scatter it like a dissolute spendthrift.

II

Beatus ille

Praises of country life. The Idyll, as has been said, is turned into an Epode by the irony of the conclusion, which has the force of 'so men say—but their acts show how little they believe it.'

'HAPPY the man who far from schemes of business, like the early generations of mankind, ploughs and ploughs again his ancestral land with oxen of his own breeding, with no yoke of usury on his neck! He is not wakened like a soldier by the fierce clarion; he dreads no angry sea. He avoids the

¹ Built, according to legend, by Telegonus, son of Circe by Ulysses.

² A character in some unknown Comedy.

Forum and the insolent portals of the great. And so he is either wedding the tall poplar to the full-grown vine-plant, or looking forth on his herds of lowing cattle as they stray in the shady valley, or cutting off with the pruning-hook useless boughs and grafting in those of happier fruit. He is either storing in clean pitchers the squeezed honey, or shearing the unresisting sheep. Or when Autumn has lifted over the land his head wreathed with mellow fruitage, what joy it is to gather the pear from the tree he grafted, and the grape that vies with the purple dye, to present to thee, Priapus, and thee, Sire Silvanus, guardian of his bounds ! Now it is his fancy to lie under some aged holm-oak, now on the soft deep grass, whilst the streams slide along in brimming courses, birds make moan in the woods, and springs babble with gushing water, sounds to invite light slumbers. And then when the wintry months of Jove the Thunderer gather storms and snow, he either drives this way and that with his pack of dogs the wild boars into the toils set for them, or spreads on smooth pole the wide-meshed nets to catch the greedy fieldfares, or sets snares for the timid hare and the crane from over seas, sweet prizes. In such a life who does not forget any evil cares which belong to love ? But if a chaste wife do her part and grace his house with its sweet children (such as is a Sabine spouse or the sunburnt partner of the sturdy Apulian) ; pile the sacred hearth with old logs against the return of her wearied lord ; and, as she shuts the glad cattle in the wattled fold, drain dry their full udders, and broaching the sweet cask's wine of the year make ready the unbought banquet, no Lucrine shellfish could give me more delight, no turbot or scar¹, if the storm that burst in thunder on Eastern waves should direct any to our waters. The bird of Africa would not cross my palate, nor the woodcock of Ionia, with more pleasant flavour than the olive gathered from the tree's richest boughs, or the sorrel plant that loves the meadow land and the mallows that give health to the laden body, or, it may be, the lamb slain on the festivals of Terminus, or the kid snatched from the wolf's jaws. While we sit at such a banquet, what delight to look out and see the well-fed sheep hastening home, to see the wearied bullocks dragging with tired neck the reversed plough, and the home-born slaves, the swarm that makes a wealthy home, all gathered round the glowing images of the home gods !'

So spake the usurer Alfius, on the point of turning farmer. He got in on the Ides all his money that was on interest : next Kalends he is seeking to put it out again.

III

Parentis olim

A mock heroic invective against garlic which Horace has unwittingly eaten in the seasoning of some dish at Maecenas' table.

HENCEFORTH if any one with impious hand shall have wrung an aged parent's neck, make him eat garlic ! It is more deadly than any hemlock.

¹ The rhombus is traditionally rendered 'turbot,' but neither it nor the scarus is identified as a Mediterranean fish.

O iron stomachs of the harvesters ! What poison is this that is burning in my vitals ? Had the cook put viper's blood without our knowledge in that dish of herbs ? or had Canidia handled the poisonous mess ? When Medea fell in love with the chieftain, of young beauty beyond the other Argonauts, ere he went to fasten the novel yoke on the bulls' necks this was the unction with which she protected Jason. With this she smeared the gift by which she took her vengeance on his paramour ere she fled on her winged serpents. Not of such power was ever the star's vaporous heat that settles on thirsty Apulia, nor with such fervour burnt his wife's gift on the shoulders of stalwart Hercules. Oh, if ever you set your fancy on any such dish, Maecenas, may you find, in return for this pleasantry, that you cannot get a kiss when you ask for one !

IV

Lupis et agnis

A violent attack on some wealthy freedman who had risen to the command of a cohort, and who affronted Horace and the citizens by his arrogance and display.

GR^{EAT} as the quarrel which fate has set between the wolf and the lamb is the quarrel betwixt me and you, O Sir, whose back has been scored with Spanish rope-ends, whose legs with the iron fetters. Though you may strut in the pride of money, Fortune cannot change the blood. See you how, as you march from end to end of the Sacra Via with your gown twice three ells broad, frankest indignation marks the faces of those that pass you to and fro?—‘This fellow, once flayed by the lashes of the triumvirs till the crier was tired, now ploughs a thousand acres of Falernian soil, and drives his ponies on the Appian way, and sits in state as a knight on the front benches, and snaps his fingers at Otho¹. What mean we by launching all these beaked and heavy-weighted ships of war against a gang of brigands and slaves², when such as he, aye he, commands a cohort of our soldiers !’

V

At O deorumCanidia.

Compare Epod. 17 and Sat. 1. 8. Canidia is represented as a witch engaged in drawing to herself by spells of magic a wretched old man, who is named Varus. The Scholiasts tell us that under the pseudonym of Canidia Horace attacked a lady named Gratidia. That the form of the attack is not to be taken quite seriously is clear from the Satire (probably the earliest of the three poems), but the feeling behind it cannot be fully measured.

The Epode opens with the cries of a boy who has been set in the midst by the hags and sees that they have some dreadful purpose.

‘ OH, every god in heaven that rules the earth and the race of man ! what means this tumult, and what so many eyes all glaring fiercely on one poor boy ? Oh, by thy own children, if in true pangs Lucina has heard and helped thee, by this purple's empty adornment¹

¹ One among several references to the law of L. Roscius Otho, which set apart fourteen rows in the theatre for the knights and those of ‘equestrian census.’ It was intended to be exclusive in its effect : but this man has got the money and so cannot be excluded.

² In reference to the war against Sextus Pompeius (see Epod. 9 with note).

I pray thee, by Jove, who will surely disallow thy deed, why dost thou gaze on me like a stepmother or like a wounded wild beast?' When, despite these piteous cries from his trembling lips, the boy is set, stripped of the emblems of boyhood, a childish form such as might soften the hard hearts of Thracians, Canidia, with short vipers entwined in her dishevelled hair, bids bring wild fig-trees rooted up among the tombs, bids bring funereal cypresses, and eggs and feathers of the nightly screech-owl smeared with the blood of a hideous toad, and herbs sent from Iolcus and Hiberia, the fruitful gardens of magic drugs, and bones snatched from between the teeth of a starving dog, and burn them all in the witches' flame. Sagana meanwhile, girt up for the task, sprinkles all over the house waters of Avernus, her hair on end like a sea-urchin or a boar as she bustles about. Veia, not deterred a whit by the full knowledge of her crime, was scooping out of the ground with the stubborn spade, groaning as she dug, a hole where the boy might be buried and die within full sight of food changed twice or thrice in the long day, his head standing above ground just so much as a swimmer's body is above water when it floats by the chin, that they might take out the marrow and the liver, when it had dried up, to make a philtre, so soon as his eyeballs, fixed on the forbidden food, had withered in their sockets. That Folia of Ariminum had her part to play is the belief of gossiping Naples and all the towns near to it, Folia who can charm from their places by her words of witchcraft the stars and moon and snatch them from the sky. Just then Canidia, gnawing in jealous rage her talon-like nails, what said she and what said she not? 'O witnesses not unloyal to my purposes, Night and Diana, who rulest the silence when mystic rites are performed, now, even now be present; now turn your wrath and your power on the homes of our foes; while every beast is in its lair in the awful woods overcome with sweet sleep, let the dogs of the Subura bark at the fond old lover, that all may laugh at him as he comes dripping with unguent, the masterpiece of my skill!—What has happened? Why fail to-day the dread sorceries of barbarian Medea, with which ere she fled she took her revenge on her haughty rival, great Creon's daughter, what time the robe, her present, dipped in poison, took off in fire the new-made bride? Surely no herb, no root, though it lurked in rough places, has escaped me. The bed he sleeps on has been smeared with that which brings oblivion of all other loves. Ha! I see it now. He goes free, for he is loosed by the spell of some witch of greater skill. It is no vulgar philtre that shall bring thee with speed back to me, O Varus, poor soul that must shed many tears, nor are they Marsian spells at whose summons thy heart shall return home. I have a more potent plan to try, a more potent cup to brew for thy haughtiness; and sooner shall the heaven sink below the sea, and the earth be spread above it, than that thou shouldst not burn with love for me even as the pitch in yon smoky flame.'—When he heard this, the child no longer as before with gentle words would soften the ruthless hags, but doubting only how first to break the silence, uttered prayers as of Thyestes: 'Sorceries may overset the mighty laws of right and wrong: the law of human retribution they cannot. With my curses I will follow you: for the curse once pronounced no victim can make atonement. Nay, when you have bidden me die, and I have breathed my life away, I will meet you as a fury of the night, a ghost with hooked talons will I claw your faces—such power have the spirits of the dead—and sitting as a nightmare on your hearts that know no peace, I will take sleep from you for terror. The mob from street to street shall assail you on all sides with stones till they crush you for filthy hags. Afterwards your unburied limbs shall be torn by the jackals and birds of the Esquiline. Nor shall my parents, who (ah me!) must survive me, miss the pleasure of the sight.'

¹ The Romans expressed the reverence due to childhood by clothing boys in the bordered gown which belonged to the highest civil offices. This and the bulla, an ornament hung round the neck, are the 'emblems' spoken of in the following lines.

•

VI

Quid immerentis

The right and wrong use of the poetry of invective.

WHAT mean you, O watch-dog, who fly at the harmless guest though you dare not attack a wolf? Nay turn, if you have the heart, on me your impotent threats, and assail me who can bite back again. For like a Molossian or tawny Spartan hound, the shepherd's sturdy friend, I shall prick my ears and through the deep snow shall run home any beast in whose track I follow. For you, sir, after making the forest ring with your terrible voice, you stop to snuff the meat thrown in your way. Beware, beware! Of sternest purpose towards the bad, my horns are lifted and ready, as was the son-in-law¹ whom faithless Lycambes had spurned, or the keen enemy of Bupalus¹. Think you that if one assails me with a venomous tooth I shall take it and whimper like a child?

VII

Quo, quo scelesti

One of the earliest of the poems in which Horace expresses his horror of the aimless prolongation of civil war.

WHITHER rush ye, O wicked people? Why are hands grasping again the swords that had been sheathed? Has too little of Latin blood been shed on dry land and on Neptune's realm, not that Romans might burn the proud towers of rival Carthage, or that the Briton yet untamed might walk in chains down the sacred way, but that the Parthians' prayers might be granted and Rome might perish by her own hand? This was never the wont of wolves or lions, to turn their fierceness save on some other kind. Is it madness or some overmastering power that hurries you on—or wickedness? Make answer. They are mute; and ashy paleness dyes their faces; and their conscience-stricken hearts sink within them. So it is. A bitter doom pursues the Roman race, the sin of brother's murder, from the day when the blood of innocent Remus flowed on the ground to be the curse of children's children.

¹ Archilochus and Hipponax, both Greek writers of lampoons.

IX

Quando repostum

It has been usually thought that this Epode was composed when the news of the victory at Actium first reached Rome; but recently it has been held more likely that it was written on the spot, perhaps for an extempore banquet on board Maecenas' galley (see Introd. p. 18).

WHEN shall I drink with you, O happy Maecenas, in our joy at Caesar's triumph, under your lofty hall, so Jove has pleased, the Caecuban stored for such a banquet, while the lyre gives forth its notes mingled with the pipes, the one a Dorian, the others a barbarian strain! Even as we did so lately when the Neptune-born chief¹ fled, driven from the sea and his ships burnt, after threatening the city with the chains which he had struck off from his friends the traitor slaves. To think of Romans—after-ages will not credit it—sold as bondsmen to a woman, carrying stake and arms of a soldier and yet brooking to slave at the bidding of wrinkled eunuchs, while amid the warriors' standards—O sight of shame—the sun looks down on a mosquito tent! Chafing at sight of them twice a thousand Gauls turned their horses' heads and raised the cry of 'Caesar!'; and the foemen's ships back to the left and hide themselves in the haven. Ho, Triumph-god, is it thou that delayest the golden chariot and the unyoked heifers? Ho, Triumph-god, he was not such a captain whom thou broughtest home from the war of Jugurtha¹, nor he of Africa whose monument his valour built him on the ruins of Carthage². Vanquished by land and sea, the foe has changed his scarlet for a cloak of mourning. He is making either for Crete, with her famous hundred cities—but he will not command the winds which carry him—or for the Syrtes, still vexed by the south wind, or he drifts on the pathless sea. Bring, boy, bring hither larger goblets and wine of Chios or Lesbos; or rather, to check any rising qualms³, measure out for us the Caecuban. All care and fear for Caesar's state we would cast free by help of the sweet Enfranchiser⁴.

¹ Sextus Pompeius, defeated by Agrippa at Naulochus B.C. 36. He is said to have given himself out to be a son of Neptune.

X

Mala soluta

We only know the poet Maevius from this Epode and from Virgil's contemptuous wish for one who does not hate Bavius that he may love the poems of Maevius. In Ode 1. 3 Horace wishes Virgil a good voyage, so in the Epode he wishes Maevius a bad one.

UNDER an evil star she slips her moorings and goes forth, the ship whose stinking cargo is Maevius. Forget not, O south-west wind, to lash both her sides with ugly waves. May the black south-east strew the upturned sea with cables and shattered oars! May the north wind rise as high as when on the mountain-tops he breaks the trembling holm-oaks! May no friendly

¹ Marius.

² A difficult line of which neither the reading nor the meaning can be considered as settled.

³ It is difficult to think that these words do not imply that the writer was at sea or thinking of people at sea.

⁴ See note on p. 33.

star appear all through the black night on which Orion sets in gloom ! May he ride on a sea no calmer than the conquering Grecian host, when Pallas turned her wrath from Ilium in ashes on to Ajax' impious bark ! Ah me, how shall your mariners soon be sweating, and yourself turning pale and yellow, and crying out in that womanish fashion, and praying to Jove's averted face, when the Ionian gulf, roaring before the rainy south wind, has sprung a leak in your hull ! But if a dainty morsel be flung on the curving shore to glut the cormorants, a lusty goat and a ewe lamb shall be slain in sacrifice to the Tempests.

XIII

Horrida tempestas

Lessons of Epicureanism drawn from winter (very much in the vein of Ode 1. 9).

THE sky is lowering with hideous storms and Jove descending in rain and snow : now the sea, now the forests roar in the north wind : let us snatch opportunity, my friends, ere the day passes, and whilst our knees have still sap in them¹ and we fitly may, let us clear our brows at least of the clouds that old age gathers. Go, dear friend, broach the wine that was pressed under my own consul Torquatus². Speak not now of aught else. Heaven, may be, by some kindly change will bring it all back as it was before. To-day our one joy is to be drenched in Persian perfumes, and with the music of Cyllene's lyre to make the heart light of hateful care. As the glorious Centaur sang to his mighty pupil¹: 'Hero, mortal though the son of a goddess-mother Thetis, thou must yet see the land of Assaracus, which the icy stream of tiny Scamander furrows and the sliding Simois. Return from thence the sister Fates have cut off from thee by the fixed length of the thread they spin: nor shall thy sea-nymph mother be able to bring thee home again. There lighten all the ills of life with wine and song, the sweet consolations of grim melancholy.'

¹ The Latin suggests a contrast hard to indicate in English between the winter outside, and the freshness of spring and freedom from clouds which it is still possible to keep within.

² Od. 3. 21. 1. L. Manlius Torquatus, consul in the year of Horace's birth, B.C. 65.

XIV

Mollis inertia

Why the Epodes are so long in finishing.

WHY soft sloth has steeped my inmost sense in such forgetfulness as though I had drained into a parched throat some cup that brought the slumbers of Lethe, O truth-loving friend, Maecenas, you kill me by your often asking. A god—I can only answer—a god forbids me to complete the roll of my iambics, the poem so long promised. Even so they tell us Anacreon of Teos loved, and oftentimes wailed over his passion on the hollow shell in artless measures. You yourself feel the fire and its pain. Yet rejoice in your happy lot. She that fired beleaguered Troy was not more lovely. She whom I pine for is Phryne, a freed-woman with a score of lovers.

¹ The story of Chiron (the Centaur) and Achilles.

XV

Nox erat et caelo

Inconstancy.

'TWAS night and the moon was shining in a cloudless sky amid the host of lesser stars, when, with the heart to wrong the majesty of mighty gods, you swore after my words, clasping me all the while with clinging arms closer than the ivy clasps the tall holm-oak, that while wolves were the foes of sheep, and Orion of sailors when he troubled the winter sea, and while Apollo let his unshorn hair toss in the winds, this our love should be mutual. Alas, Neaera, you shall be sorry that I am the man I am; for if Flaccus has in him aught of a man, he will not bear your favours shown to a rival, but in his anger will seek a heart as constant as his own. Nor will his resolution yield to the charms of a beauty which has once become odious, if the pain has entered and fixed itself. And for you, sir, whoever you are, my happier rival who now triumph in my pain—though you may be rich in cattle and broad acres, or own Pactolus' stream, and though no secret be unknown to you of Pythagoras and his second birth, and though in beauty you surpass Nireus—alas for you! you shall yet mourn over love that has fled elsewhere, and then in my turn I shall have the laugh.

XVI

Altera iam teritur

To be set with Epode 7 as a lively expression of weariness and disgust at civil war, but before Horace had seen in the rule of Octavianus the escape from it. 'Let us sail off to the Happy Islands' is a way of saying 'there is no escape.'

A SECOND age already is wearing away in civil wars, and Rome is tumbling under the strength of her own arms. The city which neither the neighbouring Marsians could destroy, nor the Etruscan bands of threatening Porsena, nor the rival valour of Capua, nor keen Spartacus and the Allobroges faithless to revolution¹, nor fierce Germany with her blue-eyed sons could tame and Hannibal, the loathing of parents' hearts—that city we shall destroy, an impious age and a doomed race; and the ground it stands on shall be tenanted once more by wild beasts. Ah me, a barbarian conqueror shall stand over its ashes, and trample the city under his horse's ringing hoofs, and scatter in contumely (O sight of horror!) the bones of Quirinus that lie sheltered from winds and suns.

May be you are asking with one voice, or the better part of you, what can help you to get quit of your sad troubles. Let no advice be preferred to this: even as the whole state of the Phocaeans² having sworn an oath went forth in exile from their lands and the homes of their sires, and left their temples to be the lairs of wild boars and robber wolves, even so to go whithersoever our feet shall carry us, whithersoever over the waters the south wind or the wild south-west shall invite us. Is it your pleasure so? Or has any aught better to advise ? Then, since the omens favour, why delay to embark ? Only let us swear to this : So soon as stones shall rise from the water's depth and swim on the surface, then let it be no sin for us to come back ; no shame to turn our sails and set them for home when the Po shall wash the Matine hill-tops or lofty Mount Apennine shall run out into the sea, when strange loves shall make monstrous unions of unheard-of passion, when tigers choose to mate with stags and the dove with the kite, when cattle grow trustful and fear not the tawny lion, and the goat grows smooth and learns to love the salt seas. Such an oath let us swear, or any other that may cut off for ever all sweet returning, and let us go—the entire state, having sworn our oath, or at least the part better than the wilful crowd—leave softness and despair to hug still their ill-starred bed of sloth. You who have men's hearts, put aside womanish wailing, and spread your sails along the Tuscan shore. For us is waiting the ambient Ocean. Let us look for the land, the happy land, the islands of wealth ; where the soil unploughed gives its corn-crop year by year, and the vineyard ever blooms unpruned, and the olive shoot buds and never breaks its promise, and the dark blue fig adorns its own ungrafted tree. Honey drops from the hollow holm-oak, light streams dance down the mountain-side with tinkling foot. There the she-goats come unsummoned to the milkpail, and the flock for love brings home its full udders ; no bear of the evening roars around the sheepfold, nor the ground heaves high with vipers. And many another wonder shall our happy eyes see—how neither the watery east wind sweeps the land with floods of rain, nor the fruitful plants are burnt in a dry soil, for that the king of heaven tempers either extreme. Hither nor the sturdy rowers of the Argo brought their pine bark, nor the shameless Colchian set her foot. Hither sailors from Sidon never turned their yard-arms, nor Ulysses' toil-worn crew. No taint of plague destroys their herds, no dog-star's furious rages fever their flocks. These shores Jupiter severed from the world for a people of the good, when he debased with brass the times of gold—with brass and then with iron he made hard the ages, from which now a happy escape is offered to the good through my prophetic mouth.

¹ This refers to the part played by the embassy of the Allobroges in respect of the Catilinarian conspiracy.

² Herodotus tells (I. 165) the story how half the population of Phocaea in Ionia, when pressed by the Persians, sailed away westward to Corsica and Italy. Aristotle adds that eventually they founded Massilia (Marseilles).

XVII

Iam iam efficaci

Under the form of a recantation offered by himself and rejected by Canidia, Horace repeats and aggravates his attack upon her in Epode 5 and Sat. 1. 8.

Horace. I YIELD, I yield to the power of thy science, and on my knees I pray—by the realm of Proserpine and by the might of Diana that none may provoke; aye, and by the book of magic spells that can draw the stars from the sky and bring them down to earth—Canidia, stay at length thy mystic words, and let go, loose and let go, the spinning wheel. Telephus touched the heart of the Nereid's son¹, though he had marshalled against him in defiance the hosts of Mysia and hurled sharp-pointed weapons. The Ilian matrons anointed for burial man-slaying Hector's body, though it had been sentenced to birds of carrion and to dogs, when the king left his city and fell on his face at the feet (ah me!) of the hard-hearted Achilles. Ulysses' toil-worn rowers by Circe's grace put off their swinish shape and hard and bristling hides; then mind and speech slipped back, and the wonted beauty into their faces. I have suffered thy vengeance enough and to spare, O best-beloved of sailors and pedlars. My youth is gone, and the blushing pink has left me, mere bones covered with yellow skin. My hair is white from your magic perfumes: no rest gives me respite from my pain. Day treads on the heels of night and night of day, nor can I draw the breath that would ease my strained lungs. So I am constrained to believe to my sorrow, what I denied, that Sabellian charms can ring through and through the heart and Marsian incantations make the head burst asunder. What wish you more? O sea and earth, I burn as neither Hercules in the unction of Nessus' poisonous blood, nor the Sicilian flame that ever lives in fiery Aetna. You are a laboratory of magic drugs whose fires will not slacken till I am burnt to ashes for the winds to scatter in their rough play. What end, what composition may I look to? Speak! I will pay loyally any penalty you name. I am ready to offer expiation if you shall ask a hecatomb, or desire that I shall tune my lyre to falsehood and sing of you. You the modest, you the good, shall walk among the stars a golden constellation. Castor when he was wroth for defamed Helen's sake, and mighty Castor's brother, were overcome by prayer and gave the poet back the eyes they had taken from him. Even so do you—for you have the power—loose me from my madness. O lady that never went in rags from a father's meanness, no hag cunning in groping among the nine-day ashes of a pauper graveyard, your heart is kindly and your hands are clean, and Pactumeius is the child of your own womb.

¹ Achilles.

Canidia. Why pour prayers to sealed ears? Not more deaf are the rocks to the naked sailors' cry, when the winter sea lashes them with high-running surf. To think that without suffering for it you should have divulged and laughed at the rites of Cotytto, and the mysteries of free love, and after playing the pontiff at my witcheries on the Esquiline should have made me with impunity the talk of the town! What profit then should I have for having made the fortune of Pelignian hags and brewed a poison-bowl of quicker powers? But the fate that awaits you is slower than you would pray for. You must drag on a hateful life for this one purpose, to be for ever the food of fresh pangs. The sire of faithless Pelops longs for rest. Tantalus, as he hungers ever for the boon of food. Prometheus longs, as he lies bound, the prey of his bird. Sisyphus longs that he may fix his stone on the mountain-top; but the laws of Jove forbid it. You shall wish now to leap from tower-tops, now to pierce your breast with a sword of Noric steel. In vain shall you twist nooses for your throat in the anguish of your weary sorrow. Then shall I ride in triumph astride my foe's shoulders, and the earth shall bow to my insolent triumph. What, though I can make waxen images feel, as you know through your prying, and can snatch the moon from the sky by my spells, can call up the dead from their urns and brew a philtre of desire, must I mourn the issue of an art powerless against you ?

SATIRES

BOOK I

I Qui fit, Maecenas

Wishing and enjoying.

The subject of the Satire is the weakness which Horace is always attacking, that of wishing for what we have not, instead of enjoying what we have. The folly is seen in its extreme form in the hoarder of money. His case, his unreasonableness, and the vanity of his excuses, are set out at length ; but the Satire begins and ends more generally.

HOW comes it, Maecenas, that, whether it be self-chosen or flung to him by chance, every one is discontented with his own lot and keeps his praises for those who tread some other path ? ‘O happy traders¹!’ cries the soldier, as he feels the weight of years, his limbs crippled with hard service. Hear the trader, on the other hand, when his ship is tossing in the south winds : ‘Soldiering is the better business. Do you doubt it ? There is the battle shock, and in a few minutes’ space comes a speedy death or the joy of victory.’ The adept in law and statute, when a client is battering at his door before cockcrow, has a word of praise for the farmer. That poor fellow yonder who has been dragged into town from the country to keep his surety cries that they only are happy who live in town. The other instances which I could add—so many are they—are enough to tire out the tongue of Fabius. To cut it short, hear the moral that I draw. If some god were to appear and say, ‘Look you, I will grant your desires this moment. You who were but now a soldier shall be a trader, you who were a counsel a countryman. Now, sirs, change your places; your parts are changed. Quick! why do you stand still?’ They do not wish it. Yet bliss is theirs if they will. What reason can be pleaded why Jupiter should not puff both his cheeks with anger at them and say that never again will he be so easy as to open his ear to vow of theirs? Once more (not to dismiss the question with a laugh like a mere jester—and yet, why may not one be telling truth while one laughs, as teachers sometimes give little boys cakes to coax them into learning their letters?—still, let us put play aside and treat the question seriously) yonder fellow laboriously ploughing the heavy sod, my cheating host here, the soldier, the sailors who cross so boldly every sea, all say that this is the purpose with which they bear their toil, that when they are old they may be able to retire and securely take their rest, when they have gathered enough (their phrase is) to give them their ‘rations,’ just as (it is the proverbial example) the tiny toilsome ant is to be seen dragging whatever she can get hold of with her mouth, and adding it to the heap which she builds, because she knows and plans for what is to come. Yes, but in her case, so soon as the Water-carrier ¹ saddens the inverted year, she stirs no more abroad, but uses that store of which you speak, the store which she has gathered beforehand, for she is wise; while as for you, neither summer's heat nor winter's cold, fire, sea, nor sword, can turn you from the pursuit of gain—nothing stops you, if only there may be no rival richer than yourself. What profit is it to have gathered a vast weight of silver and gold and then in stealth and in terror to hide it in a hole in the ground?

¹ The mercator in Horace is the trader who sails his own ship.

‘If once you were to break in on it, it would soon dwindle to the last worthless brass coin.’

But if you do not, what beauty has the heap you have piled? Your threshing-floor has threshed, suppose, a hundred thousand bushels: you cannot for that reason swallow more than I can, any more than if you chanced to be the one in a train of slaves to carry on your shoulders the heavy bread-net you could get more of it for yourself than the slave who carried nothing. Or again, tell me, what does it matter to the man who lives within the limits which Nature sets whether he ploughs a hundred acres or a thousand?

‘It is so delightful to take from a large heap.’

Provided you let me take from a small one exactly the same quantity, why should you laud your granary above my bin? It is as if you required not more than a pitcher, or even a ladleful, of water, and were to say, 'If I had the choice I would rather draw from a broad river than the same quantity from this mean little spring.' That is how it happens to those who set their fancy on quantity beyond the bounds of good sense to be swept away, with the bank which they stand on, by Aufidus in his fury ; while the man who asks only for the little that he needs neither finds his draught fouled with mud nor loses his life in the waters. But half the world says (such are the illusions of greed) 'Enough you can never have ; for the more you were to have, the more you would be thought of.' What can you do to a man who talks so ? Bid him be miserable, since so he chooses. He is like a man at Athens, as miserly as he was rich, who, they tell us, was wont to pour contempt on what the people said after this fashion : 'The people hisses me, but I applaud myself, as often as I gaze on the moneys in my chest.'

¹ The sun was in the sign of Aquarius from the middle of January to the middle of February. The phrase ‘inverted year’ has been adopted into English poetry by Dryden, Thomson, and Cowper.

Tantalus, ever thirsty, catches at the streams that fly from his lips : why do you smile ? Change but the name, and it is of yourself that tale is told. When you have ransacked the world to fill your money-bags you put them under your pillow and sleep with parted lips, but you do not dare touch them any more than if they belonged to a god, or take any pleasure in them save as pictures to look at. Do you know what money is meant for, to what uses it may be put ? You may buy a loaf with it, garden stuff, a pint of wine, and other things which our human nature would feel pain at being denied. Perhaps it is a pleasure to you to lie awake half-dead with terror, to spend nights and days alike in fear of those wicked thieves, of fire, of slaves that may rob you and run away. In such blessings as those I for my part should wish all my life to be poor indeed.

‘But if you have caught cold and are racked with pain, or some accident has made you a prisoner in bed, you have some one to sit by you, prepare the applications, beseech the doctor to raise you from your bed and restore you to your children and dear relations.’

Why, even your wife does not wish you well again, nor your son: every one hates you, neighbours and acquaintances, man and maid. Can you wonder, when you rank everything after your money, that no one renders you the love which you do not earn? You can hardly think, when Nature at no cost to you gives you kinsmen, that to take a little trouble to keep their love would be as sad a waste of pains as if one tried to break an ass to obey the rein and show its paces in the Campus.

The sum of my answer is, let us end our money-getting somewhere. As what you have increases, let your fears of poverty diminish; begin to bring your toil to a finish when you have gained that which you desired; lest that befall you which once on a time befell Unmidius,—it is not a long story—so rich that he measured his money by weight, so miserly that he was never dressed better than a slave; down to his last flour he was always in terror lest he should die of starvation. But his end was that a freedwoman split him down the middle with an axe, a second Clytemnestra.

‘Well, what then would you have me do? live the life of a Naevius or a Nomentanus¹?’

You insist on pitting opposites against one another as though you were making up a fight. I certainly, when I bid you not be a miser, am not bidding you turn fool and spendthrift. There is some mean between a Tanais and Visellius’ father-in-law. There is measure in everything. There are fixed limits beyond which and short of which right cannot find resting-place.

I return to the question with which I set out, how it comes that, ²like the man of avarice, every one is discontented, and rather gives his praise to those who tread other paths, pines with jealousy because another’s goat gives more milk than his own, and, instead of comparing himself with the greater crowd of men poorer than himself, is bent on surpassing first one and then another. Once start on that race, and there is ever a richer in your way. Just as, when the barriers are slipped and the chariots are flying behind the horse-hoofs, a charioteer gives his whole thought to the team in front of him, recking nothing of that poor fellow whom he passed just now and left in the ruck. This is how it comes to pass that we can seldom find one to confess that he has had a happy life, and rise contented, when his time is up, like a satisfied guest from the banquet. But enough. If I add a word more you will think that I have been plundering the portfolios of Crispinus.

¹ Nomentanus in Horace is a name that represents a spendthrift.

² Or ‘no one, like the miser in my story, approves himself, but every one rather gives &c.’

II

Ambubaiaiarum

*A fool's way of avoiding one folly is to fall into another*¹. This Satire, only part of which is translated, was without doubt among the earlier work which Horace's maturer taste prevented him from eventually giving to the world. It is conjectured that its preservation was due to the desire of Maecenas, who had been amused by a personal jest in it at his own expense, 'Maltinus walks about with his tunic down to his heels;' for tradition tells us that 'Maltinus' meant 'Maecenas.' Another line in it 'Rufillus smells of perfumery, Gargonius of the goat,' is made in Sat. 1. 4 a type of his personal and censorious Satire.

THE guilds of street players, the drugsellers, beggars, mime-actresses, buffoons, and all their kith and kin are in mourning and distress at the death of Tigellius. He was 'so generous,' they will tell you. On the other hand my neighbour here, for fear he should be called a prodigal, would not give to a friend in want the wherewithal to keep at arm's length cold and the pains of hunger. Another, if you should ask him why, to gratify his thankless gluttony, he is stripping bare the inheritance of two generations, buying up every costly dainty in the market with borrowed money, answers that it is because he does not wish to be held mean and poor-spirited. He wins praise from one side at cost of blame from another. Fufidius, rich in lands, rich in moneys on loan, fears the repute of a fool and a spend-thrift; so, when he lends, he deducts from the sum lent five payments of interest¹; the nearer one is to ruin the harder he presses him; he touts for borrowers among raw youths just in the gown of manhood and with strict fathers. 'Mighty Jove!'—who does not cry as soon as he hears it?—'but such a man surely spends on himself proportionately to his gain?' You would scarcely believe how poor a friend he is to himself. The father in Terence's play², who lived such a miserable life after banishing his son, never tormented himself worse than he.

¹ Another doctrine habitual with Horace. In the Art of Poetry he gives it a literary application.

If any one should be asking by this time 'to what does all this tend?' to this: Fools in avoiding a vice run into its opposite.

III

Omnibus hoc vitium

Satire and personal censoriousness.

The main subject is personal censoriousness—its frequency, its inconvenience, its unfairness, the need of mutual forbearance, of some discrimination of the relative gravity of faults. This last point leads to an attack on the Stoic doctrine of the equality of offences. But there is a further purpose in the Satire. The first paragraph is a satirical picture of Tigellius as the type of a character made up of inconsistencies. Horace supposes himself to be interrupted with the question, 'Have you no faults of your own?' 'Yes,' he answers, 'not that particular fault, possibly smaller ones, but I am not like Maenius (the representative of self-righteous censoriousness in private life), who shuts his eyes to his own faults.' As in Sat. 4, while he strikes at a common vice, he is defending the position of the Satirist.

¹ The words may mean rather 'he gets out of his capital (though it takes a knife to do it) five times the usual interest.' The usual Roman interest was 1 p.c. per month, i.e. 12 p.c. per annum.

² The Heautontimorumenus, or Self-tormentor.

ALL singers have this fault: when they are begged to sing in a party of friends they can never persuade themselves to do it; when they are not asked they never leave off. This was the way with Tigellius, that true Sardinian. Caesar, though he could compel him, if he besought him by his father's friendship and his own, could make no way with him. If the fellow was in the humour for it, he would sing over and over, from the eggs to the apples¹, 'Io Bacche!' up and down the whole scale. There was nothing in him on one level. You would often see him running as though he had an enemy at his heels, very often stalking as though he were carrying Juno's sacred vessels. Often he would keep two hundred slaves, often ten. At one moment his talk was kings and tetrarchs, all on the grand scale; at another 'Give me a three-footed table and a shell of clean salt, and a gown as coarse as you please if it can keep out the cold.' Suppose you gave a million to this pattern of thrift and contentment, in five days he had nothing in his purse. He was awake all night till broad daylight and snoring all the day. Never was a creature so inconsistent.

Now some one will say to me, 'What of yourself? Have you no faults?' Yes, I have, not the same ones—it may possibly be less ones. When Maenius once was picking Novius to pieces behind his back, 'Ho, sir,' said some one, 'do you not know your own faults? Or do you think, as though we did not know them, that you are imposing on us?' 'I shut my eyes¹ to my own faults,' answered Maenius. Such self-love as that is foolish and outrageous, and deserves to be branded for what it is. Your eyes, when they are cast over your own faults, are weak and still smarting from the ointment. Why to those of your friends are you as keen of vision as an eagle or as a serpent of Epidaurus? The return you get is that they again look closely into your faults.

¹ i.e. from the first course to the last. See introduction to Sat. 2. 4.

'He is a little too hot-tempered. He does not quite suit our exquisite modern taste. He may even raise a smile by the rustic cut of his beard, the ill sit of his gown, his loose shoes that will hardly stay on his feet.' Aye, but he is a good man, none better—but he is your friend—but under that uncouth outside are hidden vast gifts of mind². Lastly, give yourself a good shaking³: see whether nature, or even (it may be) bad habit, have sown in you any seeds of fault; for once neglect land, and fern grows in it for the bonfire.

Let us aim first at the lover's practice, whose eyes are blind to his mistress's blemishes, or even find them beauties, as Balbinus did with Hagna's large nose. I could wish that we made that mistake in friendship, and that virtue had given the mistake an honourable name.

¹ There is a play, impossible to keep, on ignoras, ignotum, ignosco.

² The Scholiasts have a story, most probably an invention, that the Dominie Sampson portrayed is Horace's friend, the poet Virgil.

³ As if you were searching a thief's pockets.

† W. T. H.

But at least we might do for a friend what a father does for his son—not be disgusted for a single blemish. Of a boy who squints his father says that he has a little cast¹; if he has one who is 'as dwarfish as the misbegotten Sisyphus, that he is a chicken. One with bandy legs he fondly calls his little 'Varus,' one that can scarcely stand on his twisted ankles his 'Scaurus.' Has a friend thrifty habits? Let us say he is 'steady.' Another is deficient in tact and is a little given to brag: he claims that his friends should set it down to the wish to be good company. Or again, he is more bluff and free-spoken than he need be, let him be taken for frank and courageous. He is too hot-headed; let him be reckoned a man of energy. This, I believe, is what both makes friends and keeps them when made. But we turn even virtues the wrong way upwards, and want to foul a clean vessel. Have we among us a worthy fellow more unassuming than others? We nickname him slow and stupid. Another is on his defence against snares and bent on offering no exposed side to malice, seeing that we live in a world where envy is keen and slanders are rife: instead of speaking of his sense and caution we call him artful and deep. Is one somewhat simple, and such as I dare say I have often shown myself to you, Maecenas, interrupting you perhaps when reading or resting with some troublesome chatter: 'he is utterly without the social instinct' we say. Ah me! how rashly do we give our sanction to a harsh law which will recoil upon ourselves! For none in this world is without failings: he is best who labours under the smallest ones. My friend who wishes me to love him must be indulgent, and weigh, as is fair, my good qualities against my failings, and turn the balance in favour of these as the more numerous—if, as I hope, the good are the more numerous. On this condition he shall be weighed in similar scales. He who expects his friend not to be annoyed at his wens will excuse the other's warts. It is fair play that one who asks indulgence for shortcomings should give it in return. In fine, since no knife will cut away the failing of anger and all the others that cling to us poor fools¹, why does not Reason employ her own weights and measures, and apportion the severity of punishment to the reality of each offence? If one were to crucify a slave who, when bidden to remove a dish, has been tempted to taste the half-eaten fish in its lukewarm sauce, sane men at least would call him more insane than Labeo. How much madder and greater a crime is this: a friend has committed some small offence, which it would seem ungracious not to excuse; you hate him bitterly and shun him, as Ruso is shunned by the poor wretch, his debtor, who, if by the time the sad Kalends come he cannot hunt up from somewhere either interest or principal, has to offer his throat like a captive in war and listen to his odious histories. Say a friend has had an accident, knocked off the table a salt-cellar which Evander had fingered ¹, for this offence, or because when hungry he snatched before me a chicken set on my side of the dish, is he therefore to be less pleasant in my eyes? What shall I do if he commits theft or betrays a trust or repudiates a pledge?

¹ There is a double point in some, if not in all, of the names supposed to be used by the father. In some cases they certainly designated a less extreme form of the blemish. But they were also all names of more or less distinguished Roman families.

¹ Horace humorously accepts for himself and the mass of mankind the title which the Stoics would give to all but the perfect man or philosopher. He is going presently to have his revenge upon them.

Those ² whose creed is that all offences are pretty nearly on a par are in difficulty when they come to face facts. The moral feelings rebel, and even utility, the mother, or next to it, of justice and right.

³ When living beings first crawled on earth's surface, dumb brute beasts, they fought for their acorns and their lair with nails and fists. then with clubs, and so from stage to stage with the weapons which need thereafter fashioned for them, until they discovered language ⁴ by which to make sounds express feelings. From that moment they began to give up war, to build cities, and to frame laws that none should thief or rob or commit adultery. For there had been wantons before Helen who had been the shameful cause of war;

¹ See Sat. 2. 3 (p. 217). There seems to have been a considerable sale in Rome for 'old curiosities.'

² The Stoics.

³ This sketch (after the Epicurean doctrine as set forth especially in Lucretius 5. 925 foll.) of the origin of society is intended to justify the statement that utility, and not any transcendental distinction of right and wrong, is the origin of law. If this is so it is evident that, tried by that test, all offences are not equal, for they are not equally injurious.

⁴ Literally 'verbs and nouns.'

but in those days they died inglorious deaths whom, snatching the pleasures of lawless love after the manner of beasts, some superior in physical strength struck down like the bull in a herd. If you examine the dates of the world's history you will have to confess that the source of justice was the fear of injustice. As Nature can draw no line between the unjust and the just, in the way that she does between what is advantageous and the reverse, what is to be sought and what is to be avoided, so Reason will never prove to us that the offence is one and the same to cut a tempting cabbage in a neighbour's garden and to rob a temple in the night-time. We need a rule to assign fair punishments to offences, lest you assail with the executioner's scourge what deserves the schoolmaster's strap. For that you will chastise with the cane one who deserves severe stripes, that is not what I fear when you say that larceny is on the same level as robbery with violence, and threaten that you would cut back small crimes and great with much the same pruning-hook if men would make you king. Nay, if the wise man, and he alone, is 'rich and a good cobbler and beautiful and a king¹,' why are you sighing for that which you already have? 'You do not know' he answers 'what our father Chrysippus² means. The wise man has never made a slipper for himself of Greek cut or of Latin; yet the wise man is a cobbler.' How? 'As Hermogenes, though he may not be singing a note, is still the best of singers and musicians; as the versatile Alfenus¹, after he had thrown away every tool of his art and shut up his shop, was a barber ; so the wise man is the only master of every craft, so he is a king.' Wanton little boys pluck at your beard, and unless you beat them well with your staff you have a crowd of them swarming round you and teasing you, while you snarl in impotent rage, O mightiest of mighty kings. To cut it short, while your majesty goes to your farthing² bath without a single attendant except the foolish Crispinus, my indulgent friends will pardon me if I make a slip—for I am 'not a wise man'—and in return I shall gladly suffer their shortcomings, and in my private station shall have a happier lot than you as a king.

¹ See the end of Epist. I. I.

² Chrysippus, the second founder of Stoicism.

IV

Eupolis atque CratinusAn apology for writing Satire.

The purposes are (1) to indicate Horace's attitude towards his great predecessor in Satire, Lucilius (compare the 10th Satire of this Book); (2) to justify and determine the position of Satire (in Horace's sense of the word) as a form of literature; (3) to defend himself against the charge levelled against Satire as the expression of misanthropy or malignity.

It is to be noticed that he repudiates the intention of publishing his Satires. He composes them for his own pleasure and profit, and only reads them to friends and when pressed to do so.

¹ According to the Scholiasts he migrated to Rome and became an eminent jurist.

² Quadrans, the fourth part of the as, was the recognized fee at the public baths.

EUPOLIS and Cratinus and Aristophanes, those poets indeed, and the other true men to whom the Comedy of old days belongs, if any one deserved to be drawn as a rogue and a thief, as a rake or cut-throat, or as infamous in any other way, branded him with great freedom. It is to them that Lucilius owes what he is. They are the masters whom he followed in all but their metre. He was witty, of keenest perception, harsh in the construction of his verse. His defect was this : he often as a feat would dictate without effort two hundred verses in an hour. In the turbid stream there was much which you would desire away. He was garrulous, and slow to bear the trouble of writing—of writing correctly, I mean : for quantity I do not count. See, Crispinus is ready to challenge me at long odds : ‘Take your tablets, if you please : I will take mine. Let place be fixed for us, and time and arbiters ; and let us see which can write the most.’ Thank Heaven which, when it moulded me, gave me few ideas and a poor spirit and a tongue of rare and scanty utterance ! I leave it to you, as you prefer it, to be like the air imprisoned in the goat-skin bellows, which puffs and puffs till the fire softens the iron.

What a happy man is Fannius¹ when he has sent unasked his books and his mask to the library! My writings no one reads, and I fear to read them in public, for the reason that there are people who particularly dislike my style of composition, knowing well that more than half the world deserves the satirist's lash. Choose whom you like from out of a crowd: he is suffering either from avarice or some miserable ambition. One is mad with love for somebody else's wife. One is attracted by the sheen of silver: Albius' whole soul is in bronzes. Another is busy trading from the rising sun to that which warms the lands of evening; nay, rushes headlong through pains like a column of dust before the whirlwind, in terror lest he lose an atom of his earnings or in hope of adding to his wealth. All of these dread verse-writing, hate the name of poet: 'He carries hay on his horns¹, give him a wide berth: provided he can raise a laugh he will spare no friend, and whatever he has once daubed on his paper he will rejoice to have known to every boy and old dame as they come home from the bakehouse and the tank.'

¹ A poetaster named also in Sat I. 10, but unknown otherwise. The meaning of the following words can only be guessed. They should imply his self-sufficiency and love of publicity. Pliny tells us that when Pollio founded the first public library at Rome he put into it imagines or waxen masks of great authors, but only admitted Varro of living ones. It is suggested that Fannius volunteered for some such honour.

Come, now listen to a few words in answer. First I must strike my name from the list of those whom I shall admit to be poets. For you must not call it enough to make a verse scan, nor give a man the name of poet while he writes, as I do, in the style of common talk. Who has the native gift, who has the inspired soul and tongue of lofty utterance, to him you may give the honour of that name. And so some have questioned whether even Comedy is or is not poetry; since it lacks the fire and force of inspiration both in diction and matter, and, save that it differs from talk in the fixity of rhythm, is mere talk. 'But surely,' you say, 'there is fire when a father is storming because his spendthrift son, mad after a worthless mistress, refuses a wife with a large dower, or in a drunken fit parades the town (a great scandal) with torches in the day-time.' Would Pomponius hear words less vehement than those if it were a father in real life? It is clear that it is not enough to make up your verse of plain words such that, if you broke it up into its materials, any father you choose would express anger in the same style as the one in your play. With the verses which I write, or which Lucilius in old days wrote, if you took away the regularity of quantity and rhythm, and altered the order of the words, you would not, as you would if you decomposed such lines as

¹ A wisp of hay on the horns was the mark of a dangerous bull.

'When foul Discord's jar
Had burst the steel-clad doors and oped the gates of war'¹—

recognize, even in his dismembered state, the limbs of a poet.

But enough of this. Whether this kind of composition be proper poetry or not is a question for another time. At this moment I am asking only whether you are justified in looking so jealously on it. Sulcius² with his keen scent and Caius² go up and down with hoarse ill-omened voices and armed with their note-books, the terror, both of them, of robbers. If a man's life is honest and his hands clean he may think scorn of both of them. Even suppose you are like Caelius and Birrius, the robbers, while I am not like Caprius or Sulcius, why should you dread me? It does not follow that shop or pillar¹ displays my books to be thumbed by the crowd and Hermogenes Tigellius². Nor do I read them to any save to friends, and to them only when I cannot help it—not anywhere or before every one. There are men who read their books in the middle of the Forum, men who read in the baths: 'It is such a good place' they say 'for sound.' That is what the empty-headed like. They do not ask whether what they do is out of taste, or out of season.

¹ From Ennius.

² Professional accusers. The names are probably literary, from some comedy or from Lucilius.

. 'You delight in giving pain' my critic says, 'and do it purposely from some crook in your nature.'

Where did you find that to throw at me? Does a single person with whom I have lived vouch for it? The man who backbites an absent friend, nay, who does not stand up for him when another blames him, the man who angles for bursts of laughter and for the reputæ of a wit, who can invent what he never saw, who cannot keep a secret—that man is black at heart: mark and avoid him, if you are a Roman indeed. You may often see out of a party, with four upon each of the three couches, one who loves to bespatter with water clean or foul every one except the host, and him also presently, when he has well drunk and the truth-telling god of freedom unlocks his heart. This man you think a good fellow, well bred and frank—you who so hate the ‘black-hearted.’ For me, if I have had a laugh at ‘the foolish¹ Rufillus for smelling of perfumery, Gargonius like a goat¹,’ do you think I have poison in my fang? Suppose the talk turned in your presence on the thefts of Petillius Capitolinus, you would defend him after your fashion: ‘Capitolinus is an old comrade of mine, a friend from boyhood; he has often done me a good turn when I have asked him, and that he is alive and at large in Rome is a joy to me—yet how he ever came safe out of that trial, I own, I marvel!’ That is the very blackness of the cuttlefish, the sheer poison of verdigris. That vice I promise you, if I can promise anything truly, will be far distant from my pages, and, to go further back, from my heart.

¹ i.e. a pillar in an arcade against which booksellers exposed their wares.

² He is, with Horace, the representative of the effeminate and foppish taste of the day in music and poetry.

If my words perhaps are rather frank and rather playful, you will be kind and grant me this licence. The best of fathers taught me the habit by the way he had of branding one by one by means of examples the vices which I was to avoid. When he would exhort me to live thriftily, frugally, and content with the provision he had made for me, ‘Do you not see’ he would say ‘what a bad life young Albius has of it, and how Baius has come to beggary? A great warning to you not to squander your patrimony!’ When he would deter me from base amours, ‘Do not you be like Scetanus. The exposure of Trebonius is not a pretty story. Philosophers will give you better reasons than I can why one thing is better than another to avoid or to seek. It is enough for me if I can keep the rule which I inherited from my forefathers, and guard safely your life and name so long as you need a guardian. When years have brought strength to body and mind, you will swim without the corks.’ With such talk he tried to mould me in my boyhood; and whether he were advising me to do something, ‘You have a good pattern in so acting’ he would say, and point to some one on the judges’ panel; or forbidding something, ‘Can you doubt whether this is dishonourable and inexpedient or not when such and such a man is in the full glow of ill repute?’ When the greedy are feeling sick a neighbour’s funeral frightens them, and drives them, from fear of death, to be careful of themselves. It is thanks to his training that I am whole from all the vices which bring ruin; that the faults which still entangle me are lesser ones and such as you would excuse. Perhaps even these may be largely reduced by length of years, honest friends, self-counsel; for when I retire to my couch or to a walk in the colonnade I do not forget myself: ‘This course is right. . . By acting so I shall be a happier man. . . This is the way to be welcome to my friends. . . That is not pretty conduct of so and so. . . Is it possible that without knowing it I may some day do something like them?’ So, with my lips shut tight, I talk to myself. When I find a moment of leisure, I waste some paper. This is one of those lesser faults of which I spoke. If you should not grant it indulgence, then there would come an army of poets to my succour—for we are more than half mankind—and, like Jews, make a proselyte of you.

¹ Quoted from Sat. I. 2. See p. 164.

V

Egressum magnaThe Journey to Brundisium.

A humorous sketch of a journey taken by the poet in the company of Maecenas. Maecenas is going on state business, not indicated more particularly except that it concerned the relations between Octavianus and Antony.

One purpose of the Satire was, no doubt, to give a picture of the poet's relations to Maecenas, the freedom and absence of servility which characterized them, the literary circle with which they were shared, the absence of any political bearing in the intimacy. It is a comment on this last point that the poem so entirely lacks reference to political events that we cannot fix with any certainty the occasion or date of the journey.

It is to be remembered that to the Romans a journey to Brundisium (Brindisi) was what a journey to Dover was a generation or two ago to Englishmen, Brundisium being the port from which the passage to Greece was made. The journey begins on the Appian way. At Appii Forum the travellers leave the road and pass the night in a barge on the canal through the Pomptine marsh. From Anxur they journey by Fundi, Formiae, Sinuessa, to Capua. From there they strike into the Apennines by Caudium and Beneventum, descending into Apulia and so by the coast to Brundisium.

FRESH from Rome's grandeur I found a resting-place in a modest inn at Aricia; my companion Heliodorus the rhetorician, most learned of all Greeks.

Next Appii Forum¹, a place crammed full of bargemen and close-fisted innkeepers. In our laziness we made two days' journey of what is but one to better travellers. The Appian road is less tiring if you take it slowly. Here for the water's sake, which was most vile, I broke off all parley with my appetite, and sat in a bad temper waiting till my companions had supped. Night was beginning to draw her curtain over the world and to sprinkle her stars on the sky. Then arises a babel of voices—slaves slanging bargemen, bargemen slaves: 'Ho, boatman, thrust in here!' 'Are you putting three hundred on board? Hold, there are enough already.' In collecting the fares and harnessing the mule an hour is spent before we are off. Rascally mosquitoes and frogs of the marsh frustrate all efforts at sleep, and meanwhile the bargeman and a passenger, both fuddled with bad wine, sing maudlin love songs against one another. At last the passenger tires and drops asleep, and the lazy bargeman turns his mule to grass, tethers it to a stone, flings himself on his back, and begins to snore. Day was already breaking when we discover that the barge is not moving, until one of the party who has a temper leaps ashore, cuts a willow cudgel, and belabours head and back of mule and man. It is quite ten o'clock before we land and wash face and hands in thy sacred water, Feronia. Then we breakfast, and crawl in carriages the three miles uphill to Anxur, perched on its far-seen white cliffs. It was here that Maecenas was to meet us, and Cocceius, best of men, envoys both of them on high state affairs, and old hands at reconciling estranged friends. My business here was to smear my sore eyes with the black eye-salve. While I am so engaged, Maecenas arrives and Cocceius, and with them Fonteius Capito, the pink of accomplishment, and without a rival in Antony's friendship.

¹ It will be remembered as a stage in St. Paul's road from Puteoli to Rome, Acts 28. 15.

Fundi we are not sorry to leave, with its praetor •Aufidius Luscus, laughing, as we go, at the high preferment of the crack-brained clerk, his edged gown and broad stripe and shovel of hot charcoal¹. After a long day our next resting-place is the city of Mamurra² and his like, where Murena finds the house and Capito stocks the kitchen. The next day's dawn was the most welcome of all, for at Sinuessa we are joined by Plotius with Varius and Virgil³, whitest-souled of earth's children, and to whom none owes deeper debts than I. How we embraced, and how we rejoiced! Never while I keep my senses shall I compare anything to the delight of a friend.

The little house by the bridge where you enter

¹ The praetexta or gown with a purple border belonged to higher magistrates at Rome, the broad stripe down the front of the tunic to senators. What the purpose of the shovel of charcoal was, is not known. The jack-in-office at Fundi is represented apparently as assuming both in title and in dress distinctions which did not belong to him.

² The place is Formiae (now Mola di Gaeta). Mamurra was a favourite of Julius Caesar whose wealth and scandals had occupied men's thoughts.

³ Plotius and Varius were afterwards Virgil's literary executors. For Varius see Od. 1. 6.

Campania gave us shelter, and the commissaries the due provision of fuel and salt. After the next stage our mules deposit their saddle-bags betimes at Capua. Here Maecenas goes off to play, Virgil and I to sleep; for a game of ball is equally bad for sore eyes and for the dyspeptic. Our next entertainment is at the well-stocked country house of Cocceius, which stands beyond the taverns of Caudium.

¹ Now, my Muse, I would have you recount in brief* the engagement of Sarmentus, the trencherman, and Messius Cicirrus, and the parentage from which the two heroes sprung who joined the wordy fray. Messius was of right famous stock, an Oscan; the mistress of Sarmentus is still living—such the lineage with which they came to the fight. Sarmentus opens: ‘I call you the very image of a unicorn.’ We laugh, and Messius himself, ‘Be it so,’ and makes as though he would butt. ‘Oh!’ says the other, ‘if only the horn had not been cut out of your forehead, what would you be capable of, seeing that you are so formidable without it!’ The fact was he had a disfiguring scar on the left side of his bristly forehead. With many jests on the disease of Campania and on his face, he prayed him to dance the shepherd Cyclops: he would need neither mask nor satyr’s buskin. Cicirrus had plenty to answer.

¹ A mock heroic commencement. Horace describes an encounter of wit between two buffoons, Sarmentus, a scurra travelling in the suite of Maecenas, and Messius, a native of the neighbourhood and probably belonging to the household of Cocceius. They figure as something like the jesters of feudal times.

Had he presented his chain yet, he asked, to the Lares, as he vowed? Clerk though he was, that did not make his mistress's right less good in law. His last question was why he had ever run away, since a pound of meal was enough for one so slim and puny. Full merrily we spent that supper-time.

Thence without a halt we journey to Beneventum, where the bustling host nearly burned himself out of house while turning some skinny fieldfares at the fire. For the Fire-god slipped abroad through the old kitchen, and the flame on its travels was well nigh catching the roof-tree. Then followed a scene—hungry guests and frightened servants snatching at the supper, and all trying to put out the flames.

From this point Apulia begins to show to my eyes the outline of its familiar hills¹, which the sirocco scorches, and up which we had never crawled had not a country house in the near neighbourhood of Trivicum given us a night's lodging, spoilt by smoke that drew tears as the stove was lighted with damp wood, the leaves still on.

Thence we bowl downhill in carriages four and twenty miles, to rest in a little town which I may not identify in verse by its name, though I may easily by these tokens: it is a place where water, the cheapest of things, costs money, but the bread is far away the best on the road, so that the old traveller is wont to load his slaves' shoulders with it for the next stage; for Canusium, which sturdy old Diomede founded, is not by a pitcherful better off for water, and its bread is gritty. Here Varius and his friends part company, he sad and they in tears. Next night we arrived at Rubi, wearied out, for it was a long stage to travel and the rain had broken up the road. Next day the weather was better, the road worse, right up to the walls of fish-famous Barium. Then Gnatia, built under the displeasure of the water-nymphs, gave us food for laughter and jests by its anxiety to persuade us that frankincense melts without fire when it crosses the temple's threshold. Apella the Jew must believe it, not I; for I have learnt the lesson¹ that gods live in careless ease, and that if Nature works some marvel it is not something sent down from the vault of heaven by gods out of humour. Brundisium is the end of a long story and a long journey.

¹ They were the hills at the head of the waters of his native Aufidus.

VI

Non quia, Maecenas

The Freedman's son.

The starting-point of the Satire is the jealousy to which Horace felt himself to be exposed as the son of a freedman. This leads to several passages of personal interest—

- 1. the narrative of his introduction to Maecenas ;*
- 2. the noble picture of his relations to his own father ;*
- 3. the description of his modest and happy life in Rome.*

But the Satire is intended also to touch at many points that which Horace ranks as (next only to avarice) a vice of Roman society, viz. ambition, both in the sense of pretending to, and of seeking, greater position than naturally belongs to us.

¹ i. e. the Epicurean doctrine of Lucretius.

THAT of all the Lydians¹ that are settled in Tuscan territory none is of better blood than you, or that you have had a grandsire on mother's side and father's too who commanded mighty legions in days of old, does not make you do, Maecenas, as the world does, hang on the crook of your nose those of unknown origin, such as me, the freedman's son.

You say that if a man be himself free-born it matters not what his parents were. When you say so, you argue rightly, that long before the reign of Tullius², the lowly born king, there lived many who, though they had no line of ancestors, were good men and true and were distinguished with offices of honour; that Laevinus, on the other hand, descendant of the Valerius at whose hands proud Tarquin was driven a fugitive from his throne, was never set at more than the value of a brass coin, even when the people acted as censor, a judge you know of what kind—how in its folly it gives high office to the unworthy and is the foolish slave of rumour, and is lost in admiration of titles of honour and waxen masks. What then ought you and I to do, who rank ourselves so far above the crowd?

For be it so that the people would prefer in the case of an office to give it to a Laevinus rather than to a Decius of no family, and that an Appius as censor would strike me off the list if I were not the son of a free-born father—and rightly too, since (like the ass in the fable) I had not rested content in my own skin.

¹ The Lydian origin of the Etruscans is a commonplace in Latin poetry.

² Servius Tullius, the son of a slave mother.

But, the truth is, glory drags bound at the wheels of her triumphal chariot the unknown no less than the well-born. What did you gain, Tillius, by reassuming the stripe¹ and becoming a tribune? Envy has gathered to you which would be less were you in a private station. For as soon as a man has been mad enough to embarrass his leg up to the knee with the black thongs and has dropped the broad stripe down his breast, forthwith he hears: 'What fellow is this? What was his father?' Just as, if one suffered from the same weakness as Barrus, of desiring to be thought handsome, wherever he went he would make the ladies take the trouble to ask about details, what his face was like, his ankle, his foot, his teeth, his hair; so if one offers to take the charge of his fellow citizens and of the city, of the Empire and of Italy, of the temples of the gods, he compels all the world to care and to ask who his father was, whether there is any flaw on his mother's side. 'Do you, sir, the son of Syrus², Dama², Dionysius², dare to fling from the rock or hand over to Cadmus³ a Roman citizen?' You say 'Novius, my colleague, takes a place a whole row behind me, for he is now what my father was.' Do you therefore fancy yourself a Paulus or a Messalla? You forget that he has a stentorian voice which, if two hundred teams and three funerals were all in the Forum at once, could be heard over the horns and trumpets; that is some claim at least on us.

¹ See note on p. 181.

² Common names of slaves.

³ Said to be the name of an executioner.

Now to return to myself, the ‘son of a freedman sire,’ whom as the son of a freedman sire all carp at, now because I am your frequent guest, Maecenas; in old days it was because I was a tribune in command of a Roman legion. The present case is unlike the former. It does not follow that because it is open to any one to grudge me the office, therefore he may equally grudge me your friendship, especially as you are so careful to choose friends for merit, with no room left for crooked ways of winning favour. Lucky I cannot call myself, in the sense that it was by chance that I gained your friendship. It was no accident that threw you in my way. Virgil long ago, the best of men, and after him Varius, told you all about me. When I was first introduced to you I stammered out a few words, for tongue-tied shyness would not allow me to say more. Certainly I did not tell you that I was of distinguished parentage, or that I was used to ride a Tarentine pony round an estate of my own. I told you the truth as to what I was. You answered, as you usually do, in few words, and I went away. Nine months afterwards you sent for me again, and bade me consider myself one of your friends. For my part, I am proud to think that I pleased one who draws as you do the line between honour and disgrace, not by a father’s renown but by the blamelessness of my own life and heart. But after all, if the faults are slight and few in a nature otherwise sound, as you might find a mole here or there to notice on a handsome person, if no one will truly charge me with avarice or meanness or debauchery, if my life is without stain or harm (forgive my egotism), and if my friends love me, for all this I have to thank my good father, who, though a poor man with a hungry little farm, yet would not send me to Flavius' school, whither the sons of centurions, bigger and grander than I, with satchel and tablet hung on left arm, used to go carrying every Ides their fee of eight brass pieces each¹; but ventured to carry off his boy to Rome to be taught all the accomplishments that any knight or senator would have his children taught. Any one who saw how I was dressed, and what a train of slaves I had after the fashion of a great city, would have supposed that such expenditure was furnished from inherited wealth. What he did for me himself was to come with me daily from lecture to lecture, the safest of possible governors. Need I say more? He kept me modest, which is virtue's earliest distinction, and safe not only from deed of shame but from breath of scandal. He had no fear that by-and-by, if I should have to earn a small livelihood as an auctioneer, or, as he was himself, a collector of dues, some one would say he had wasted his money. Nor in the event should I have made that complaint; but as things have turned out I owe him the greater praise and the greater gratitude. Never while I am in my sound senses could I be ashamed of such a father. And so I do not mean to defend myself, as a large part of the world would do, by saying that it is not the fault of malice prepense that they had not free-born or illustrious parents. 'Such a reply is in a very different key from anything that I either say or feel. If Nature were to invite us after a cycle of years to live our lives over again and to select to the full of our pride fresh parents, each might choose for himself—content with those I had, I should have no desire for people distinguished by the rods and ivory chair; and, though the world pronounce me mad, I dare say you will still hold me sane for not wishing to undertake a burdensome load to which I am not accustomed. For forthwith I should have to get a larger income, to receive more visitors, to take with me one companion and another, for I must never go into the country or abroad alone. I must keep a stableful of grooms and horses, and take a train of wagons. As things are, I may ride if I choose as far as Tarentum on a bob-tailed mule, whose loins are sore with saddle-bags and his withers with the rider. No one will charge me with stinginess as he does you, Tillius, when as praetor you go along the road to Tibur with five boys behind you carrying a cooking-pot and wine-basket. This is a point in which my life is more comfortable than yours, my illustrious senator, and there are thousands besides. Wherever my fancy is, I go on foot and go alone. I ask the price of kitchen-stuff and grain: I often stroll about the cheating Circus and the Forum towards evening: I stop by the fortune-tellers. Presently I return home to my dish of leeks and pulse and macaroni. My supper is served by three boys, and a slab of white stone supports two drinking-cups with a ladle. By them stands a salt-cellar of cheap material, a cruet and saucer of Campania ware. Then I go off to bed, with no anxious thought that I must rise early to-morrow and face poor Marsyas¹, so distressed by the look of the younger Novius. I lie still till past nine o'clock. After this, when I have read or written in quiet as pleases my fancy, I take a stroll or anoint myself with the olive oil of better quality than that which filthy Natta steals from the lamps. But when I am tired, and the fiercer sun has warned me to go to the baths, I am off from the Campus and the game of three. After a moderate luncheon, just enough to save my going a whole day on an empty stomach, I amuse myself at home. Such is the life of men set free from the pains and burdens of ambition. In this way I console myself with thinking that I shall live more happily than if my grandfather had been a quaestor, aye, and my father and uncle to boot.

¹ Or, acc. to the other reading, 'carrying their fee on the Ides of eight months' (i.e. every month when schools were open).

VII

Proscripti RegisRupilius Rex.

Probably, like the second Satire, one of Horace's earliest compositions. It tells a story of the time in A.D. 44 or 43, when he was with Brutus in the province of Asia. The main point is the play on the name Rex with which it ends, a form of humour which the Romans highly appreciated; but the story is told in a lively way and the different types of the two litigants are well marked—the half-Greek trader, courtly, fluent, witty, and the country-bred Italian, thick-skinned and heavy-handed in his sarcasm.

¹ Marsyas was the satyr who was flayed by Apollo. There was a statue of him in the Forum. Horace humorously attributes either a look of pain on his face or some gesture to his displeasure at the frequent presence of the younger Novius, according to the Scholiasts a moneylender.

HOW the half-breed Persius repaid the filth and venom of Rupilius, that outlawed 'King,' is a tale familiar I think to every sore-eyed man and barber¹. This Persius was a rich man, with business in a large way at Clazomenae, who had a troublesome lawsuit with Rex; he was tough, one who in offensive manner could beat even Rex, bold and blustering, and of tongue bitter enough to leave a Sisenna or a Barrus nowhere in the running. To come to the story of Rex. When they cannot settle their difference—(for men at law are always troublesome to one another, or not, in virtue of the same quality² as heroes who meet in single combat: between Hector, Priam's son, and Achilles, the soul of courage, the quarrel was mortal, so that nothing short of death could part them, for no single reason but this, that in each of them valour reached its highest point: if cowards had the misfortune to quarrel, or if two met in war who were ill-matched, as Diomedes with Lycian Glaucus, the one of least spirit would retire from the fight offering gifts of propitiation)—well, when Brutus was praetor in charge of the rich province of Asia, there was a fight between Rupilius and Persius, a pair as well matched as Bithus and Bacchius. They rush into court keen combatants, each of them a sight to see. Persius sets forth his case, to the amusement of all the bystanders. He praises

¹ Apothecaries' and barbers' shops are spoken of as the chief places of gossip.

² Or 'all quarrelsome persons have the same right.'

Brutus, and he praises his staff. The 'sun of Asia' he calls Brutus, and 'stars of good influence' all his suite—Rex only excepted, for his coming was that of the 'dog-star, the farmers' bane.' So he rushed on, like winter torrent down some ravine of uncleared woodland. In answer to that copious flood of wit, the man of Praeneste has abuse to hurl back like the juice wrung from a vineyard, as though he were the vinedresser tough and unconquerable who is often too much for the passer-by that calls 'cuckoo'¹ at him. But the Greek Persius, when he was well soused with the Italian vinegar, cries aloud, 'By the great gods, Brutus, I adjure you, since it is your wont to put kings out of the way, why do you not slay this Rex? Believe me it is a task for you.'

VIII

Olim truncus eramCanidia.

The Satire must be read with the 5th and 17th Epodes. It is probably in date the first of Horace's attacks on Canidia.

The mock-heroic tone of the narrative and the farcical catastrophe seem to forbid us to take it quite seriously.

The scene is the 'Campus Esquilinus,' on a site outside the 'agger' of Scrvius Tullius, where there had been a large burial place for the lowest class of the people. Maecenas had recently bought it and laid it out as gardens, but the transformation seems scarcely complete. There are still 'sepulchral mounds' and bones to be found by scratching the ground, and it is haunted by witches.

The speaker throughout the Satire is a rough wooden image of Priapus, the god of gardens, which in the utilitarian spirit of Roman religion serves in part as a scarecrow.

¹ To call 'cuckoo' was to imply that the vinedresser was still at work, which should be done before the cuckoo comes.

EREWHILE I was a trunk of figwood, a piece of useless timber, when the carpenter after doubting whether to make a stool or a Priapus made his choice for the god. And so a god I am, the special terror of thieves and of birds; for thieves are kept in awe by my right hand¹ and red pole, and the mischievous birds are frightened by the reed² set on my head from settling on the newly-made gardens. To this place in old days slaves paid some one to bring in a cheap bier the carcass of a fellow slave when it was tossed out of his narrow quarters. It was the common graveyard for the dregs of the people, Pantolabus the trencherman and Nomentanus the spendthrift. A boundary stone used to give here a thousand feet frontage and three hundred of depth, the burying place to go to no heirs or assigns. Nowadays men may live on the Esquiline and find it healthy, and take their walk in the sun on the rampart, from which before there was the sad look out over ground disfigured with blanching bones. For myself, my annoyance and trouble now is not so much the thieves and jackals which used to infest the place, as the witches who with spells and sorceries torment human souls—these I cannot make an end of or stay them in any manner. so soon as the moon on her travels has lifted her fair face above the horizon, from gathering bones and herbs of harm. With my own eyes I have seen Canidia come with black mantle girt high, with bare feet and streaming hair, howling in concert with Sagana, greater than herself, each of them terrible to look on. First they dug the ground with their nails and tore a black ewe-lamb to pieces with their teeth; the blood was collected in a trench that thereby they might draw the spirits of the dead, souls to give oracular answer. Then there was an effigy of wool, another of wax; the one of wool the larger, that it might hold the weaker in durance and punishment, the waxen one standing in suppliant attitude as expecting sentence to a slave's death. One witch calls on Hecate; the other on fell Tisiphone. You might see serpents and hell-hounds moving about, and the blushing moon that she might not witness such sights hiding behind the huge sepulchral mounds. Nay, if I lie in anything, may my head be defiled by the crows and the worst of each sex use me for basest purposes! Need I tell each detail—how sad and shrill sounded the voices of the shades in dialogue with Sagana—how they buried stealthily in the ground a wolf's beard and the tooth of a spotted snake—how the waxen image made fire blaze higher—and how I avenged myself for being the shuddering witness of the words and deeds of the two Furies? With a noise as of a burst bladder my buttock of fig-wood split with a pop, and off they scurried into the town. You might see Canidia drop her teeth and Sagana her tall wig, and the herbs and the charmed love-knots from their arms; and great was the laughter and the niirth.

¹ Which held a sickle.

² Apparently a rattle formed of reeds.

IX

Ibam forte ViaA morning stroll in Rome.

The subject, on the face of it, is the sufferings of Horace under the persecution of a man of strong will and thick skin who meets him during his morning stroll; but, as appears in the later part of the Satire, this is only the dramatic presentment of a more serious theme. In Sat. i. 6 Horace has given an account of his own introduction to Maecenas' friendship, how small a part he had himself had in it, and how consistent with self-respect every stage of it had been. This Satire gives, in contrast, a picture of the way in which vulgar and pushing people sought, and sought in vain, to obtain an introduction.

IT chanced I was strolling in the Sacra Via, conning after my fashion some trifle I know not what, and wholly absorbed in it, when a man I just knew by name runs up to me and seizes my hand with 'How do you do, my dearest friend?' 'Pretty well, just now' I answered, 'I hope you are the same.' When I saw that he was following at my heels I turn on him with 'Is there anything I can do for you?' He: 'You surely know me, we are both men of letters.' 'Indeed' said I, 'that will be a recommendation to me.' Longing miserably to shake him off, I first quickened my pace, then stopped short, made as though I was whispering something in my slave's ear—in a fume all the time that made every pore stream. 'O Bolanus, you happy man,' I was saying to myself, 'if only I had your hot temper!' while the fellow rattled on upon anything and nothing, praising the streets, the town. When I made him no answer, 'I know you must be sadly wanting to get rid of me' says he, 'but it is no good¹, I cannot let you go—I shall attend you to your destination.' 'There is no need to take you so far round. I am going to visit a friend whom you do not know. He lives a long way off, on the other side of the river, near Caesar's gardens, and he is ill in bed.' 'I have no business and am in the humour for a walk—I shall come all the way with you.' Down go my ears like those of a sullen ass when he is laden beyond his liking. He is the first to speak next: 'We should be friends. If I know anything of myself you will not value Viscus more, nor Varius. Who can write verses more in number or more quickly than I can? Who can dance more gracefully? My singing even Hermogenes might envy.' Here he gave me a moment's chance of interrupting: 'Have you a mother² or kindred to take care of you?' 'Not one—I have laid them all to rest.' 'Happy souls³, I am the only one left. Make haste and finish me, for the hour is come for that sad fate which when I was a boy the Sabellian crone foretold for me, after shaking the lots in her divining urn:

No sword shall kill, no poison injure him.
 Nor aching side nor cough nor crippled limb:
 This lad a chatterbox alone will slay;
 Talkers let him avoid, if he would live his day!

¹ Of course this is meant as a jest. The man cannot conceive that his company is really displeasing.

² Possibly Horace means to hint that the man is out of his mind and should be taken care of by his relations.

³ Evidently an 'aside,' for no reply is made.

We had come now to Vesta's temple¹ and it was past nine o'clock, and it so chanced that at that hour he was bound on his recognizances to appear in court under penalty, if he failed, of losing his suit. 'If you love me' says he 'wait a little to give me your countenance.' 'Nay, I protest I am not strong enough to stand so long, and I know nothing of law matters, and besides I must hasten whither you know.' 'I am in a strait' he says 'what to do, to desert you or my suit.' 'Oh! me, please.' 'I cannot' says he; and begins to lead the way. It is hard fighting with one who is your master, so I follow him. 'On what terms is Maecenas with you?' so he starts afresh, 'a man choice in his friends and who knows what's what. No one has played his cards more dexterously. You might have a strong backer, and one quite prepared to take a second part to you, if you would introduce your humble servant. Hang me if you would not find that you had cleared every one else from your way!' 'You misunderstand the terms on which we live there. There is no house purer or more free from such intrigues as that. It never stands in my way' I say 'that one is richer than I or more learned. Each has his own place.' 'Dear me, what you tell me sounds like a miracle.' 'Yet it is a fact.' 'You whet my desire for his intimacy.' 'You have only to wish for it—your valour is such that you will storm the fort. He is to be won, and that is why he makes the first approaches difficult.' 'I will not fail myself: I will bribe his slaves: if the door is shut on me to-day I will not give it up; I will watch my opportunity; I will fall in with him in the streets and escort him home. The prizes of life are never to be had without trouble.' While he is so occupied Aristius Fuscus¹ met us, a dear friend of mine, and one who, I felt sure, knew him only too well. We halt. 'Whence come you and whither go you?' is asked and answered. I tried plucking his sleeve, squeezing his arm, but it showed no feeling. I nodded, winked fiercely at him, as a hint that he should save me. With cruel humour he smiled and pretended not to understand. I was burning with wrath. 'You surely told me you had something you wished to talk about privately.' 'I remember fully, but I will tell you at some better time. Do you not know to-day is the thirtieth Sabbath²—do you wish to insult the Jews?' 'I have no superstitious scruple' say I. 'But I have—I am not as strong-minded—one of the many—you will pardon me—I will talk another day.' To think so black a day as this has dawned on me! He makes off ruthlessly and leaves me with the knife at my throat.

¹ i. e. the corner of the Palatine where the Sacra Via entered the Forum and where Horace's path would diverge to the left if he were going to cross the river in the direction of Caesar's gardens on the Janiculum.

At that moment it so happened that the plaintiff in the suit came down the road and met my companion:

¹ Horace's intimate friend; see Od. 1. 22 and Epist. 1. 10.

² The phrase is probably a riddle without a key. It seems a composition of the two phrases the 'Sabbath' and 'the thirtieth' day of the month, i. e. the new moon: some words with a mystic sound, but chosen at random.

‘Where are you going, you scoundrel?’ he cries, and to me ‘Witness my summons.’ I offer my ear to touch¹—he drags him off towards the court, both shouting and a mob collecting. So Apollo bore me from the fray².

X Nempe incomposito

Lucilius and Horace. Fair and unfair criticism.

The Satire, as its last words testify, was viewed by Horace as an Epilogue to the Book. He reiterates and defines his position with respect to Lucilius as he had stated it in Sat. I. 4, defending himself from the contemptuous criticism of Demetrius and Hermogenes Tigellius and their school, and appealing to the judgement of the really good writers and critics of the time.

IT is true I did say that the verses of Lucilius have a halting rhythm. Who is such a silly partisan of Lucilius as not to confess so much? But on the same page he is also praised for having made the town smart with his wit. Only when I allow this merit I do not mean to grant him every other; for on that principle I should have to admire a mime of Laberius as a beautiful poem. Take it then that it is not enough by itself to make an audience grin with laughter (although there is some merit even in that): there must be the power of terse expression, that the thoughts may flow on unimpeded by the verbiage, which only tires the overladen

¹ The formality by which a person expressed his willingness to witness the serving of a summons.

² As he bore Hector in Il. 20. 443:

him wrapt in clouds opaque Apollo caught with ease divine away. Cowper.

ears: there must be the style that changes, now serious and again playful, now suited to the part of the declaimer or poet, now to the man of the world who husbands his strength and says less than he means. Humour very often cuts the knot of serious questions more trenchantly and successfully than severity. This was how the true men who wrote the old comedy won success and this is where they are to be imitated. They are writers whom Hermogenes the fop has never read, nor that ape whose one accomplishment is to drawl Calvus and Catullus.

‘But it was a great hit’ you say ‘his mingling Greek words with his Latin as he did!’

O you dunces turned pedants! How can you think it a difficult or wonderful thing to do what was within the reach of the Rhodian Pitholaus?

‘Language nicely compounded of the two tongues gains flavour, as if you mix wine of Falernian brand with Chian.’

When you are writing verses only? I put the question to yourself—or is it the case also when you have a hard case to plead, like that of Petillius? Doubtless you would forget fatherland and father, and while Pedius Publicola and Corvinus were spending their utmost strength in pleading their case in pure Latin, prefer to adulterate your mother-speech with foreign words like a bilingual Canusian¹.

I too, though born on this side of the sea, had a thought of writing some poor Greek poetry, but Quirinus himself appeared to me in the morning hours, when dreams are true, and forbade it with words like these: 'Twere no greater madness to carry timber into a forest¹ than, when you have the choice, to swell the crowded ranks of Greek writers.' So while the turgid hero of the Alps² murders Memnon and fits the Rhine with a 'head of mud,' I amuse myself with these trifles—neither poems to be read in the temple as offered for Tarpa's³ judgement, nor plays to be put again and again on the stage in the theatres. You alone of living poets, Fundanius, can charm us with the chatter of the keen-witted slave-girl and Davus cheating old Chremes. Pollio sings of the deeds of kings in the measure of triple beat⁴. Varius builds the brave Epic with a spirit all his own. Tenderness and finished grace the Muses of the country have granted to Virgil⁵. Satire, which Varro of the Atax and some others had essayed unsuccessfully, was what I could write, better than they, but below the level of its inventor. I am not the man

¹ For Canusium and its Greek origin see in Sat. I. 5 (p. 183).

¹ As we say 'coals to Newcastle.'

² Furius Bibaculus, a poet laughed at in Sat. 2. 5 (p. 241). He is called the 'hero of the Alps' on account of his verse ridiculed in that place. He had written apparently on the Death of Memnon (slain by Achilles). He incurs Horace's ridicule for speaking of the source of the Rhine as 'muddy.' It was no doubt unpoetical; but it was a truer epithet than probably either of them knew.

³ The Scholiast identifies him with the Maecius of Ars Poet. 387, and with a person employed by Pompey to approve of plays for performance in his theatre.

⁴ i. e. in tragic iambs; see Od. 2. 1.

⁵ Virgil had at this time published only the Eclogues.

to rob that famous head of the garland which with the world's applause rests upon it.

But, you repeat, I said his was 'a turbid stream, often carrying with it more than you would desire to remove than to leave.' Come, I put it to you—you are a man of learning—do you find nothing to criticize in the mighty Homer? Does Lucilius, for all his good nature, wish nothing otherwise in Accius, the great tragedian? Does he not laugh at the verses of Ennius as wanting in dignity? But this does not mean that he reckons himself as greater than those whom he so criticizes. And so for us also when we are reading the writings of Lucilius, why may we not ask whether it was his own fault or the unkind 'nature of things' that prevented his verses from being better finished or running more smoothly than those of a man who, content with merely putting his thoughts into correct six-foot measure, should pride himself on having written two hundred verses every day before luncheon and the same number after dinner, after the way of Tuscan Cassius, with his genius like a stream in flood, who (the story goes) was burnt on a pile of his own works in their cases?

Grant, I say, that Lucilius had good-tempered and well-bred humour: grant even that in polish he was beyond what the creator of a new style such as the Greeks had never tried could possibly be, beyond what the ruck of the older poets was—still even he, if fate had deferred his birth to this age, would use the polishing-file freely on his own writings, would prune redundancies, and in perfecting his verses would often scratch his head and bite his nails to the quick. You must often use the blunt end of your *stilus*¹, if you are to write what deserves a second reading; you must not care for the admiration of the many, but be content with readers fit but few. You surely are not senseless enough to prefer that your poems should be lesson-books in cheap schools. I at least am not. It is enough for me if the knights applaud—I care not a fig for the rest of the house, as bold Arbuscula said when she was hissed off the stage. Would you have me care for Pantilius, who ‘stinks and stings²,’ or be in agony because Demetrius pulls me to pieces behind my back, the tasteless boon companion of Hermogenes Tigellius? No! Plotius and Varius, Maecenas and Virgil, Valgius and Octavius, and Fuscus, best of men—let these approve my writings, and the two brothers Viscus praise them. I have no base interest when I name thee, Pollio, thee, Messalla, with thy brother, and you, Bibulus and Servius. Together with them thee, fair-souled Furnius, and many more, men of taste and friends to me, whom I could name if I chose. In their eyes I hope these verses, whatever be their value, may be pleasing; and I shall be sorry if they please them less than I hope. As for you, Demetrius and Tigellius, I bid you go whine among the armchairs of your lady admirers.

Go quick, boy, and write this as an Epilogue to my little book.

¹ The sharp end of the stilus was used to write on the waxed tablet, the blunt end to erase what was written.

² Pope.

BOOK II

I Sunt quibus in satira

Trebatius: or The right and wrong of Satire.

An imaginary dialogue between Horace and C. Trebatius Testa, a great lawyer of the generation before, known to us from Cicero's correspondence with him. There seem to be some personal touches, for the devotion of Trebatius to swimming and his fondness for such 'night-caps' (l. 14) are subjects of raillery in one or two of Cicero's letters to him.

It is an illustration of the careful order in which the Satires are arranged that this apology for Satire, and for Satire which has given offence, is made to serve as the prologue to a Second Book.

Horace. THERE are who think that I am too fierce in my Satire and carry things beyond lawful bounds. The other half of the world thinks all my composition nerveless, and that verses as good as mine might be spun a thousand a day. Give me your advice, Trebatius, what I shall do.

Trebatius. Take a holiday.

Horace. Not write verses at all, you mean?

Trebatius. I do.

Horace. The best advice, after all—may I be hanged if it isn't! But I cannot sleep.

Trebatius. Those who would sleep sound must rub the oil in and swim thrice across the Tiber, and take a nightcap of good wine, or if the passion for writing is irresistible, be bold and tell of the heroic exploits of Caesar. You will receive full reward for your pains.

Horace. Fain would I do so, good father: but the faculty fails me. Battle-lines bristling with pikes, or Gauls dying with lances shivered, or Parthian slipping wounded from his horse, are not what every one can paint.

Trebatius. If so, you might paint himself, just and strong, as Lucilius, who was a wise man, drew his hero Scipio.

Horace. When occasion prompts I will be true to myself. Unless the time be propitious the humble words of Flaccus will not find with Caesar entrance in an attentive ear. If you try awkwardly to stroke him, he is on his guard in every direction and has his heels ready.

Trebatius. How much wiser this than to assail with ill-natured verse ‘Pantolabus the trencherman and Nomentanus the spendthrift¹.’ When you do that, you make every one fear for himself and hate you, though you have not touched him.

Horace. What am I to do? Milonius, so soon as the heat of the wine has touched his head and made the lamps look double, falls to dancing². Castor finds his joy in horses, the brother, born from the same egg, in boxing. For every thousand souls there are a thousand tastes. My delight is to fit words into the frame of feet after Lucilius' fashion, a better man than either of us. He used of old to whisper his secrets to his parchments as to trusty companions, never running to any other haven, whether things had gone ill with him or well. So it comes that the whole life of the veteran lies open to our view painted as on a votive picture. It is he that I follow, a son of Lucania or of Apulia—it is hard to say which, for the settlers of Venusia plough close to the borders of the two¹, sent there, as the old tradition goes, when the Sabellians were dispossessed, for the purpose that no enemy might find the gap empty and make inroad on Roman lands², if either the Apulian race or Lucania in mood of violence were at any time threatening war. But *stilus*³ such as mine will never assail any man alive: it will protect myself, like a sword safe in its sheath. Why should I attempt to draw it while I am safe from the assault of robbers? O Jupiter, Sire and King, that the weapon may be let rust away where it lies, that none may ever attack one who desires peace! But for him who rouses me ('Better not touch me!' I cry loudly) he shall weep for it, and be the theme of talk and song throughout the town. Cervius when he is angered threatens his foes with the law and the jurors' ballot-box: Canidia with the poison of Albucius: Turius with a bad time if you come into court when he is on the bench. Every one, to frighten those he fears, uses the weapon with which he is strongest, and does this by nature's sovereign command. That is the principle, and you may prove it thus : the wolf attacks with his teeth, the bull with his horns—where did they learn that but from instinct? Put a long-lived mother within spendthrift Scaeva's power : his filial hand will commit no crime—what a marvel ! no, not any more than a wolf will attack with his heels or an ox with his teeth ; but the villainous hemlock in some drugged honey will carry off the old lady. To make a short story—whether a tranquil old age is in store for me, or Death already is flapping its black wings round me, rich or poor, at home or, if chance so order it, in exile, whatever the colour of my life, I shall go on writing.

¹ A line quoted from Sat. I. 8 as a specimen of Horace’s personal satire.

² In men a great sacrifice of Roman decorum. Cicero in his defence of Murena (pro Mur. 6. 13) says that ‘no one dances unless he is either drunk or mad.’

¹ Cp. Od. 3. 4.

² A good description of the military purpose of a Roman 'colonia.'

³ There is a play on the double use possible of the stilus, to write on the waxed tablet and as a weapon like the modern stiletto.

Trebatius. My son, I fear your life is not a good one. Some one of your great friends will smite you with a frost that kills.

Horace. What ! when Lucilius first dared to compose poems after this kind, and to tear off the skin in which men walked with fair outside before the world's eyes, though base within, was Laelius offended at his wit, or he who drew his well-earned name from the conquest of Carthage? Did they smart because Metellus was hit hard, or Lupus pelted with lampooning verse? Yet he laid hands on the leaders of the people and on the people in whole tribes. In fact, he had fellow-feeling for none but Virtue and her friends. Nay, when Scipio's virtue and Laelius's mild wisdom had withdrawn from the crowd and public stage into privacy, they were wont to play like schoolboys with him while the cook was getting ready their supper of herbs. Whatever I am, however far below Lucilius in social rank as in native gift, yet envy will be fain unwillingly to confess that those whom I have lived with are the great, and, while thinking to close its teeth on something that will break, will strike on a solid substance. I say this, Trebatius, in submission to your judgement.

Trebatius. My teeth at any rate can break nothing off it¹. But for all that, you should be cautioned lest you get into trouble from ignorance of the Twelve Tables. So let me remind you that if any have written 'ill verses upon any man' there are courts and an indictment holds.

Horace. Aye, if they be 'ill' verses, be it so; but what if they be good ones and Caesar has praised them—if if you have but given tongue at the man who deserves abuse, while you yourself are clear?

Trebatius. In a tempest of laughter the Tables will go to pieces². You will leave the court without a stain on your character.

¹ There is a question both of reading and of sense. The Scholiast took diffindere in a technical sense, and as meaning 'I cannot adjourn the question,' i. e. 'I assent at once to what you say.'

² Another expression to which possibly the clue is wanting.

II

Quae virtus et quantaOfellus : or Plain living.

This Satire is not a dialogue, although there are two speakers, Horace interrupting twice—at the beginning to explain that we are listening not to himself but to Ofellus, and again towards the end to give his remembrance of Ofellus' habits in old days and introduce the second imagined speech, in which the old countryman applied his philosophy to his own life and that of his sons.

Ofellus is represented as belonging to the country in which Horace's early boyhood was spent, and as having been dispossessed of his property at the same time as Horace himself or his father. He has lived on as a tenant under Umbrenus, the veteran to whom the land was assigned.

The general condemnation of luxurious living suits the character of the sturdy Apulian, but there is little attempt in detail to distinguish the style or the arguments from those of a Stoic lecturer, such as we have in the next Satire. Many of the special criticisms are such as an epicure would have found it not difficult to answer.

‘WHAT the virtue, good sirs, and how great an one it is, of frugal living’—this is no talk of my own, but the teaching of Ofellus, the countryman, a philosopher, though not from the schools but of home-spun wit—‘listen and learn, not amid sheen of plate and trim tables, when the eye is dazzled by meaningless brilliance, and the mind, having learnt to lean on what is false, loses its taste for what is better : but let us talk the question over now before breaking our fast.’ ‘Why so?’ ‘I will tell you, if I can. A bribed judge weighs truth in false scales. When you come tired from hunting the hare or breaking a horse—(if the soldierly exercises of Rome are too fatiguing for one accustomed to Greek ways, perhaps a game of ball, in which the interest takes out the taste of the toil, or of quoits, attracts you; if so, by all means fling the quoit through the yielding air)—then when toil has knocked niceness out of you, when you are thirsty and hungry, despise, if you can, plain food, and refuse to drink your *mulsum*¹ unless the honey is from Hymettus and the wine Falernian. Suppose the housekeeper is out, or the sea is rough and fish not to be caught, some bread and salt will suffice to appease the wolf inside you. Whence or how do you think it gets that power? The chief pleasure lies not in the smell of costly cookery but in yourself. If you want relishes, get them by hard exercise. The man who is bloated and pale from wrong living will get no help from oysters or rare fish or foreign bird. But I suppose I shall hardly root out the prejudice which makes you wish, if a peacock is on table, to tickle your palate with this rather than a barn-door fowl. You are misled by empty show; because it is a rare bird and cost gold, and the colours of its opened tail are a sight to see—as though that had anything to do with the matter! Do you eat those feathers which you admire so? Has it the same brave show when cooked? Yet, though there is nothing to choose between them in the eating, you crave for the one rather than the other because you are taken in by the difference in the outside! Well, be it so, but what sense tells you whether the pike that lies here gasping was taken in the Tiber or in the sea, in the current off the bridges or at the mouth of the Tuscan river? You praise, foolish man, a mullet of three pounds, though, before you can help it, you have to cut it up into separate portions. It is the look, I see, that attracts you. But what then is the consistency of disliking pike if they are large? I will tell you: it is because nature makes the pike large and the mullet small. This contempt for things common belongs to the stomach which seldom feels real hunger. "O give me" cries a gullet worthy of the greedy Harpies "the sight of something vast lying at length in a vast dish!" Come in your power, O south winds, and cook the dainty dishes for these gentlemen! Yet that is not needed. The freshest boar and turbot have gone stale when the jaded stomach sickens at the food of which it has had enough, and turns for relief to some sharp-tasting salad.

¹ A drink of wine sweetened with honey.

The fare of humble life has not yet been entirely banished from the halls of princes; room is still left for cheap egg and black olive. It is not so many years since a sturgeon gave the table of Gallonius the auctioneer an ill notoriety¹. Think you there were fewer turbots then in the sea? The turbot was safe, and the stork found its nestlings safe, till an authority of praetor's rank taught you the lesson. If one now with the same authority shall have pronounced that divers are nice roasted, the young generation, always ready to learn a mischievous lesson, will follow his lead.

¹ The point is that the standard of luxurious living varies from age to age. It is a matter of fashion, and therefore not of reason.

There will be a great difference, if you trust the judgement of Ofellus, between simple living and mean living. It will be of no use to have avoided the one fault if you turn off the road in another direction. Avidienus, whose nickname of *Canis*¹ is no meaningless jest, eats his olives five years old and cornels from the woods, and is chary of opening a wine-jar till the wine is gone sour: as for his oil, you couldn't bear the smell of it, yet even if in freshly-cleaned gown he be keeping a wedding or a birthday feast or some other holiday, he drops it on his salad with his own hands, a drop at a time from the two pound horn: the only thing he does not spare is his old vinegar². What style then will the wise man adopt? Which of these two will he imitate? There is a wolf, as the proverb says, on one side, a dog on the other. He will be neat enough to let no one complain of his meanness. His mode of living will be unhappy in neither direction. He will neither be hard on his slaves when they are taking their orders, like old Albucius; nor, like too easy Naevis, let them give his guests water with grease floating on it. This too is a serious fault.

Let me tell you now what and how great are the advantages that simple living offers. First, you may have good health. For how unwholesome is a variety of dishes you may believe if you remember the plain meal of old days and how lightly it sat. But when once you have mixed boiled and roast, shellfish and fieldfares, what is sweet will turn acrid, and ill digestion raise intestine war. Do you notice the pale faces with which men rise from the supper with the puzzling bill of fare? Aye, and the body burdened by yesterday's excess weighs down with itself the mind also, and makes fast to earth the particle of heavenly breath. The other, after the refreshment that takes but a few minutes, goes to rest and wakes in full freshness for his daily tasks. Yet he will be able to cross the line sometimes to better fare, if an annual holiday comes round, or if he has been brought low and wants to recruit, and as his years increase and weakening age asks for softer treatment. But in your case, what have you in reserve against the chance of illness with its inconveniences, or the slackness of old age, to add to the softness which you forestall while still young and in good health?

¹ The dog of the Roman streets was a foul feeder.

² A receipt for a miser's salad—the oil bad, and even then sparingly measured, the vinegar good and in plenty.

The ancients used to say that a wild boar should be high—not, I suppose, that they had no nose, but with this meaning, that it was more fitting that a guest, who might come later, should eat it when it was over-kept, than the greedy master of the house when it was fresh. Oh that I had lived in the young world amid heroes like those!

You make some count, I suppose, for the world's voice. It takes the human ear with more charm than music. Big turbots and big dishes mean big disgrace as well as big expense. Add the angry uncle¹, the angry neighbours, the self-reproaches, the vain desire for death, when you have not a penny left to buy a halter with¹. “You may justly scold Trausius in that way,” he answers, “but I have great revenues, riches ample for three kings.” Well then, is there nothing better on which you could spend your superabundance? Why is any in want who does not deserve it, while you have wealth? Why are the ancient temples of the gods in ruin? Why, shameless man, do you measure nothing from that great heap for the country which you love? You, of course, alone of mankind are secure from possible reverse. Oh, how your enemies will laugh by-and-by! Which of the two will meet the chances of life with most self-confidence—one who has pampered mind and body by accustoming them to superfluities, or one who, content with little and distrustful of the future, has, like a wise man, in time of peace made ready for war?’

¹ See note on Odes 3. 12.

That you may give more credit to his words, let me say, that I remember this Ofellus when I was a boy, living as modestly on his full means as he does now that they are clipped so closely. You may see him any day on the land of which he has been dispossessed, working sturdily as a tenant farmer with his team and his sons, and he will tell you, ‘I was never one in old days to eat anything on a working day, without good reason, beyond garden stuff and a knuckle of smoked bacon; and if at rare intervals an old friend came to see me, or a neighbour dropped in on a rainy day when

¹ A proverbial jest.

I could not work, a welcome guest, we made merry not with fish sent for from town, but with a pullet or a kid; and afterwards the dessert was made out with some raisins from the string and nuts and split figs, and we had our wine and our game of forfeits, and our prayer to Ceres—so might she lift her head high on the stalks!—and our brows were smoothed from every care. Let fortune bluster and raise new troubles as she will, how much can she knock off from all this? By how much, my boys, have we been in worse case since this new proprietor came? The truth is, Nature makes neither him nor me nor any one else in a true sense owner of the land. He turned us out: he will be turned out by the villainy of some other, or by his own ignorance of the subtleties of the law: and if he is not, in the end he will be turned out by an heir whose life is a better one than his own. The land goes now by the name of Umbrenus: a few years ago it went by that of Ofellus: but it will never belong to anybody. It will yield its use now to one, now to some one else. So live, my boys, as brave men; and if fortune is adverse, front its blows with brave hearts.'

III

Sic raro scribis

Damasippus: or A mad world.

The subject of the Satire is the Stoic paradox that every one but the wise man is mad. Horace treats it after his wont, laughing at it with others, but using it as a weapon with which he can strike at practical follies. The doctrine is applied successively to the vices of avarice, ambition, extravagance, superstition. The bulk of the Satire is put into the mouth of Stertinius, a lecturer of the day. Damasippus, Horace's interlocutor in the dialogue, is a character from Cicero's Epistles, in which we hear of him as a clever go-between in the purchase of estates and works of art. Horace represents him as having been bankrupt and as having been saved from suicide by meeting Stertinius, who preached to him the Stoic doctrine, with the conclusion that as nearly all men were mad, he need not be too painfully ashamed of himself.

It will be noticed that Horace ends the Satire by good-humouredly turning the laugh against himself.

Damasippus. YOU compose so seldom that you do not ask for the parchment¹ four times a year, treating whatever you compose as a Penelope's web, angry with yourself that, though you are so generous of wine and of sleep, the amount of poetry produced is not worth mentioning. What will be the end? You reply that even in the Saturnalia you have come here for refuge. Well, then, if you are so sober, give us some utterance to match your promises. Begin. Nothing comes. The blame is laid on the undeserving pen: the innocent wall gets the worst of it—poor thing, neither gods nor poets smiled on its birth. Yet your face was as of one threatening great and brilliant things if once the holidays came and you were safe under the warm roof of your little country house. What was the good of packing Plato tight against Menander, of carrying into the country with you Eupolis, Archilochus, such grand travelling companions? Perhaps your idea is to appease ill-will by leaving Virtue to her fate¹. You will only be despised, and will deserve it. No—you must avoid the shameless Siren, idleness, or else be content to give up all that in your better hours you have earned.

¹ For the purpose of making a fair copy of a completed composition.

Horace. The gods and goddesses grant you, Damasippus, for your good advice, the boon of—a barber! But how come you to know me so well?

Damasippus. Ever since all my fortune went to pieces on 'Change I have made other people's business my care, as I had been knocked overboard from my own. Once on a time my inquiries were always whether this brass pan were the one in which cunning old Sisyphus had washed his feet, whether a marble was chiselled inartistically or a bronze cast too roughly. I posed as a connoisseur, and fixed the price of such a statue at a hundred thousand. I knew better than any one else how to buy gardens and choice town-houses at a good bargain, whence the crowd that hangs about auctions gave me the nickname of 'Mercury's favourite.'

Horace. I know it, and I am marvelling to see you cured of such a malady as that.

Damasippus. A marvel it is, but the truth is, a new one drove out the old, as happens often when the pain of suffering side or head shifts into the stomach; or when a patient wakes up from a drowsy fit and wants to fight his doctor.

¹ i. e. by giving up the writing of Satire.

Horace. As long as you do nothing of that sort, be it as you please.

Damasippus. Oh, my good sir, that you may not deceive yourself, let me tell you once for all, you too are mad. We may indeed say that every one is, who is not a philosopher, if there is any truth in what is always on the lips of Stertinius, from which I wrote down word for word these marvellous lessons, the day that he consoled me, and bade me grow the beard of wisdom, and go home from the Fabrician bridge, a sad man no longer. For after my business failed, I was meaning to wrap my head in my mantle and fling myself into the river; but he stood like a good genius by my side, and said:

‘Mind you do nothing unworthy of yourself. The shame which tortures you so is a false one. In a world of madmen you are afraid of being thought mad. For I will ask first, what is madness? If it proves to be something peculiar to you I will not say another word to prevent your dying like a man.

Chrysippus’ Stoic flock holds that any one is a madman, who under the evil influence of folly, or indeed any ignorance of the truth, does not see where he is going. This definition covers whole peoples, mighty kings, every one in fact save the wise man only.

Now let me show you why all who have dubbed you “madman” are quite as crazy as you. When men miss the path in a forest and go astray in every direction, all miss it equally, though one is led wrong on the right side of the road and one on the left. So for yourself, believe that if you are mad it is only in such a sense that the man who is laughing at you drags a tail also¹.

One kind of folly is that of the man who fears where there is nothing to fear—cries out that fire, that rocks or rivers are in his way on an open plain. Another kind, crooked at a different angle from this but not a whit more wise, is his who rushes blindfold through fire and water; though a fond mother, an honoured sister, father, wife, and all his kith and kin, shout at him “take care: there is a broad ditch in your way, a precipice!” he will not listen any more than tipsy Fufius in the story, when he over-acted the sleeping Ilione, though not one Catienus² but twelve hundred of them shouted at him “Mother, I call thee!” The madness of the world at large, I shall show you, belongs to this latter mode of missing the path.

Damasippus (say you?) is mad in buying old statues: the man who lends Damasippus money to buy them is of sound mind. Indeed? If I should say to you³

¹ A proverbial expression for being a fool without knowing it. It is said to have been an amusement of Roman gamins to tie a sheep's tail to the back of an innocent passer-by.

² Catienus is the actor, in a play of Pacuvius, of the part of the shade of Deiphilus, Ilione's son. It appears and calls on the sleeping Ilione; but the actor of her part on this occasion could not be woke, though the audience entered into the fun and shouted with Catienus ‘Mater, te appello.’

³ The argument takes the form of a dilemma. Either the man who lends Damasippus money does not expect to be repaid or he does. In the first case surely Damasippus shows no madness in taking money on such terms. In the second the lender must be trying to secure the repayment by notes of hand (‘Nerius’ seems to be either the lender himself or, more likely,

“Take this money—I never expect you to repay it,” shall you be a madman if you take it? or would it be a greater sign of insanity to refuse the special bounty of Mercury? “Give note of hand for ten thousand from Nerius.” That is not enough—add bonds such as Cicuta draws, a master in legal knots—add a hundred, a thousand links of iron! yet the hardened debtor will escape your bonds, like Proteus. When you try to arrest him he will laugh at you from behind strange masks, he will turn into a wild boar, and then into a bird, and then into a stone or, if he likes, a tree. If it proves the madman to lose a fortune and the sane man to keep it, believe me, it is the brain of Perellius¹ that is the more addled of the two if he lends you money which you can never repay.

Now I bid my class arrange their gowns neatly and listen. Every one of you who is pale from a bad attack of ambition² or avarice², or in a fever with extravagance² or gloomy superstition², or some other mental malady, come nearer to me and hear the oracle each in his turn, as I explain to you that all are mad.

Much the largest dose of hellebore³ must be ada banker or moneylender through whom the business is done) and legal knots. But he may as well try to bind Proteus. So that in any case the lender is more mad than the borrower.

¹ Perellius—the name stands here for the lender. It was probably the name, either in literature or in real life, of some notoriously sharp moneylender.

² This list of vices gives the framework of the rest of Stertinius' lecture: each is taken in turn.

³ A specific in the ancient pharmacopoeia for brain disease. Anticyra in Phocis was a place from which much was procured.

ministered to the avaricious. I am not sure that it is not for them that Reason intends the whole store of Anticyra. Staberius bound his heirs to engrave on his tomb the amount of the money he left: if they failed to do so, they were under obligation to give a show of a hundred pairs of gladiators and a funeral feast such as would satisfy Arrius, to distribute of corn a whole African harvest. "Whether I am right or wrong in so ordering"—that was his tone—"don't come the uncle¹ over me." What, I imagine, Staberius looked forward to is this. "What do you mean was in his mind," you ask, "when he bade his heirs carve on stone the amount of his estate?" So long as he was alive he had thought poverty the worst of moral vices, and spent all his pains in avoiding it. For every farthing less that he proved to have died worth he would seem to himself the worse man. Riches, you know, are the beautiful things: everything else, worth, repute, honour, things divine and things human, bow down to them. Any one who has gathered a pile of them will be famous, gallant, just. "And wise too?" Certainly—and a king and anything else he could wish. Wealth proved the worth by which it must have been won, and would be to him, he hoped, a security for fame.

What Aristippus the Greek did is at first sight very different. When he was crossing the Libyan desert he bade his slaves throw away a load of gold because it delayed their march. Which of the two is the madder? An instance carries us no further which settles one quarrel only by opening another. If a man were to buy citherns and then only make a pile of them, without the slightest interest in the cithern or in any one of the Muses,—if a man who was not a shoemaker did the same with shoemakers' knives and lasts,—a man who hated sea voyages with sails,—every one would call them crazy and mad, and deservedly so. What is the difference between them and the man who stores money and gold plate, though, after he has stored them, he does not know how to use them, and treats them as though they were sacred from his touch?

¹ See note on Ode 3. 12.

If a man were to arm himself with a big stick and lie at length, keeping perpetual guard over a great heap of threshed corn, and yet never venture to touch a grain of it though he was hungry and though he was the owner of it all, but were to feed himself rather, like a miser, on bitter herbs : if again with a thousand jars—that is nothing—with three hundred thousand—of old Chian and Falernian in his cellars, he were to drink mere vinegar—nay, if he were to lie on straw at the age of eighty save one, though he had rugs and coverlets rotting and moth-eaten in his wardrobe—few would think him mad ; no doubt, because the larger part of the world really tosses in the same fever. What are you keeping it for so carefully, you god-forsaken old man ? that a son or even a freedman heir may drink it all out ? or for fear you should come yourself to want ? Why, how small a sum will be each day's deduction from your capital, if you begin the practice of using rather better oil for your salads and for your untidy hair ? If you say that anything is good enough for you, why then do you perjure yourself, filch, plunder right and left?

Can you be sane?

If you were to take to throwing stones at passers-by, or at your own slaves who are your chattels, you would be hooted as a madman by every boy and girl in the street. When you hang your wife and poison your mother¹, no doubt, your head is untouched! Of course, as you say, you are not doing this at Argos, nor killing a mother with a sword, as did poor mad Orestes². You do not suppose he went mad after he had killed a parent. No, he had been driven out of his mind by the wicked Furies before he warmed his sword point in his mother's throat. Nay, from the moment that Orestes was held to be of unsound mind he did nothing whatever that you can find fault with. He did not venture to attack Pylades with the sword, or his sister Electra. He contents himself with using bad language, calling one a Fury, and the other by some other name which his melancholy suggested.

Opimius³, a poor man though with cellars full of silver and gold, who would drink from an earthen

¹ The purpose of the imagined crimes is, of course, to get money.

² The argument is not very clear, but this seems to be best taken as ironical defence of the crime. 'No doubt, as you say, Rome is not Argos. Such crimes are the fashion here and the methods are more artistic.' The following sentences only emphasize and justify the epithet 'mad' as applied to Orestes. 'Yes, mad he was—his act was purely an act of madness—and so is yours.'

³ Opimius, though a familiar Roman name, is chosen here for its etymology, as we might say 'Mr. Moneybags, a pauper, &c.'

nipperkin wine of Veii on holidays, and on working days wine that had gone flat, was once lying in a fit of drowsiness so profound that his heir was already running in delight and triumph round his cupboards and handling his keys. But his physician, a man of resource as well as a good friend, brings him round in this way. He bids them set a table near him and empty some bags of coin upon it, and begin several of them at once to count it. This is the way he wakes him up, and then to finish the business he says, "If you don't take care of what belongs to you, your hungry heir will be off with it." "While I am alive?" "If you want to live, then rouse yourself; attend to me." "What do you wish of me?" "Your veins are half-filled, and your system is on the point of collapsing unless you give it some extraordinary support. There is not a moment to lose. Come now, take this little cup of rice gruel." "Rice!—What did it cost?" "Oh, very little." "How much, I say?" "Threepence." "Good heavens! sir, what matters it in what way I come to my end—by disease, or by robbery and plunder?"

"Who then is sane?" The man who is not foolish. "What of the avaricious?" He is both foolish and mad. "Well, if a man is not avaricious, is he then and there sane?" Certainly not. "Why, Sir Stoic?" I will tell you. "This patient" suppose Craterus¹ to have said "has nothing wrong with his stomach." He is well then, and may leave his bed? “No,” he will say, “for lungs, or else kidneys, are suffering from acute disease.” A man is not a perjurer nor a miser. Let him slay a porker as a thank-offering to the kind Lares. But he is ambitious and reckless. Put him on board for Anticyra: for what is the real difference between flinging all you have into a gulf and making no use of what you have troubled yourself to get?

¹ The name of a physician named in Cicero's letters, and so standing for an eminent doctor.

The story goes that Servius Oppidius, a rich man as property was counted in old days, divided two farms at Canusium¹ between his two sons, and when he was dying called his boys to his bedside and said: “Ever since, when you were children, I saw you, Aulus, carrying your knucklebones and nuts² in a loose bosom-fold, making presents of them freely, and staking them in play—you, Tiberius, counting them over and hiding them in corners morosely, I have feared much that you might suffer from two different kinds of madness—that one of you should grow up like Nomentanus*and the other like Cicuta. I adjure you both, therefore, by our household gods, the one not to reduce, the other not to increase what your father thinks enough, and what is Nature’s limit for you. Further, lest you feel the itch of ambition, I shall make you both bind yourselves by this oath, that if either allows himself to be aedile or praetor, he be outlawed and accursed. You would waste your wealth on vetches and beans and lupines¹ that you might walk with an air in the Circus and have a statue of bronze, though stripped of the lands and the money that your father left you, O you madman; and all that you may be greeted with the applause which greets Agrippa, like the fox with his cunning trying to imitate the natural gifts of the lion.”

¹ We are in Horace’s native country in Apulia, so that, as with Ofellus in the preceding Satire, there is a basis of fact in the story.

² A Roman child’s playthings.

² You forbid us to think of burying Ajax. Son of Atreus, why do you so?

“I am king.”

And I am a commoner: so I ask no more.

“And my command is a reasonable one, and if any one doubts my justice, I give him free leave to say his mind.”

Mightiest of kings! may the gods grant you to take Troy and bring your ships safe home afterwards! Do you really mean that I shall be allowed to ask questions and answer again?

“Pray, ask.”

Why does Ajax, the hero second only to Achilles, who has won glory so often by saving the Greeks, lie rotting, that Priam’s people and Priam himself may rejoice at the thought that he is unburied, through whom so many of their young sons came not to the burial-place of their fathers?

¹ Apparently to be scrambled for by the populace—a form of bribery.

² An imaginary dialogue between Agamemnon and a speaker who represents the views of Stertinus. The point is that political ambition leads to crimes. Ajax slew the sheep, taking them for men—‘Agamemnon sacrifices his daughter as if she was a lamb. Which was most the act of a madman?’

“He went mad and slew a thousand sheep, crying that he was slaying the great Ulysses, and Menelaus and me.”

For yourself now, when in Aulis you set a sweet daughter at the altar instead of a calf, and sprinkled salt meal on her head, O cruel man, were you quite in your senses?

“What can you mean?”

Why, what did the crime of Ajax, the madman as you call him, come to, when he slew the sheep with the sword? He used no violence towards wife or child. He cursed the sons of Atreus plentifully, it is true; but he lifted no hand against Teucer or even Ulysses.

“Nay, it was with full purpose that, to release my fleet from its durance on the wrong side of the water, I appeased the gods with blood.”

Aye, and blood of your own, madman.

“Of my own, yes; but no madman.”

The man whose mind is the confused scene of insurgent ideas, some true, some wicked, will be judged to be of disordered brain, and it will matter nothing whether he go wrong from folly or from rage. Ajax has lost his wits when he slays the harmless lambs. When, as you say, “with full purpose” you commit a crime for the sake of empty honours, are you sound in mind? Is your heart free from flaw, when it is swelling with ambition? If one were in the habit of dressing up a pet lamb and carrying it in a litter, of furnishing it with millinery, with attendants, with gold ornaments, of calling it Rufa or Posilla, and arranging a marriage for it, the praetor by sentence of court would take from him control of his property, and he would be put under the charge of his sane relations. Well, if a man treats a daughter as a dumb lamb, and vows her to the altar, is he of sound intellect? Do not say so!

So then where there is folly which makes a man go wrong, there in its fullest sense is madness. The man who is criminal will be also out of his senses. One who is attracted by fame, as glittering as glass and as brittle, is as one that has in his ears the thunders of Bellona, whose joy is in deeds of blood.

Next, come, arraign with me extravagance, and with it Nomentanus: for Reason will prove that spendthrifts too are fools, and if fools, madmen.

A man of this stamp the moment he had received his patrimony of a thousand talents issued a notice in praetor-like style that fisherman, fruitseller, fowler, perfumer, and all the god-forsaken gang of the Tuscan street, cooks and buffoons, every purveyor in Velabrum or in market, should come to his house next morning. Need I say, they came in crowds—one is the spokesman. “Whatever I and each of these gentlemen have of our own, believe me, sir, is at your service—command it to-day or command it to-morrow.” Hear the youth’s generous answer: “You sleep in hunting-boots in the snow of Lucania that I may have a wild boar for supper. You sweep the winter seas for fish. I am a lazy fellow quite unworthy to possess all this fortune. Take it and divide it. Here is a million for you—the same for you—thrice as much for you.”

The son of Aesopus¹ for the pleasure of swallowing a clear million at a draught, took a splendid pearl from Metella's ear and melted it in vinegar. How was he more sane than if he had flung the very same thing into a running river or a sewer? The sons of Arrius, a well-matched pair of brothers, twins in worthlessness, trifling, and perverted desires, used to breakfast on nightingales bought up at great cost. To which category are they to go? Shall they have mark of chalk as sane men, or of charcoal?

If a bearded man were to amuse himself with building toy-houses, harnessing mice to a toy-cart, playing odd and even, riding a long stick, it must be madness that is turning his head. If Reason shall convince you that the lover's ways are even more childish than those, that it makes no difference whether you play at building castles on the sand as you did when you were three years old, or whimper in distress for love of a mistress, I put it to you, will you do what Polemon² in the story did when he was converted, lay aside the trappings of your disease, stockings, elbow-pillow, muffler³, as he, arrested (we are told), as he was returning from a revel, by the voice of his master who was still fasting, pulled off the chaplets from his neck? When you hold out

¹ Aesopus is the famous tragic actor of Cicero's time. The story is told by Pliny together with the similar story of Cleopatra.

² The story is a common one. Polemon heard Xenocrates lecturing as he passed his school, entered, was converted by what he heard, took to philosophy, and succeeded the lecturer.

³ Additions to ordinary dress which only the effeminate and luxurious would wear.

† W. T. H.

apples to a sulky child he refuses them. "Take them, darling." He says "No." If you did not offer them he would cry for them. What is the difference when the lover, who has had the door shut on him, deliberates whether he is to go or not to the place whither, when he was not invited, he was meaning to return, and hangs about the doors which he hates: "She¹ invites me herself: shall I not go to her? or shall my thought be rather to have done with these pains? She shut the door on me. Shall I go again? No—not if she went on her knees to me." Hark to the slave, the wiser man far of the two: "My master, a thing in which moderation and reason have no part cannot be handled according to reason and moderation. Love involves necessarily these troubles—quarrelling, and then again peacemaking. These phases shift much like the weather, and rise and fall by blind chance. If one tries to make them in his own case obey rule, he will not undo the tangle any more than if he set himself to be mad by rule of reason and moderation." Why, when you pick the pips from your Picenian apples² and are delighted when by good luck you have hit the ceiling with one, are you master of yourself? Suppose now bloodshed added to folly—the sword used to stir the fire³. The other day, for instance, when Marius murdered Hellas and flung himself from a rock, was he mad? Or will you acquit him of disordered mind and find him guilty of crime—giving things, as men so often do, names that are first cousins to one another?

¹ In these lines Horace is recalling almost verbally a scene from one of Terence's plays, the 'Eunuchus,' act I, sc. I.

² The pips were shot from between thumb and finger, and if they hit the ceiling it was an omen that love was returned.

³ A proverb.

There was a freedman who in his old age, though he had not been drinking, used to wash his hands and run from shrine to shrine of the Lares, and pray, "Save me—me only—it is such a small boon—me only—from death. To gods, surely, there is no difficulty." He was sound in both ears and eyes—his mind a master who wished to sell him would not have warranted unless he wished for a lawsuit. Him and others like him (i. e. the superstitious) Chrysippus will assign to the house of Menenius¹. "Jupiter, who givest and takest away the great pains of life," cries the mother of a boy who has been keeping his bed for five months, "if my boy gets well from his quartan ague, on the morning of thy fast-day² he shall stand naked in the Tiber." So, if chance or the doctor shall have rescued the boy from the edge of the precipice, his mother in her madness will kill him by planting him on the cold bank and bringing back his fever. What in her case is the malady that has shaken her reason? Fear of the gods.'

This was how Stertinius, eighth of the sages, armed his friend, that I might never again be called names without having an answer to make. Any one who shall speak of me as a madman shall hear a word for every one of his, and shall be taught to look into the wallet on his own back, of which he knows so little.

¹ The context shows that this means lunatics, but the origin of the phrase is unknown.

² i. e. Thursday. The division of time by weeks, and the naming of the days after the sun, moon, and five planets, was coming into vogue in Horace's time. The 'fast' is a Jewish practice, one of the two fastings in the week mentioned in St. Luke xviii. 12.

Horace. Sir Stoic—as you answer me, may you sell everything at greater profits than before your bankruptcy!—in what special folly (since there are more kinds than one) do you think my madness shows itself? For to myself I seem sane.

Damasippus. Do you suppose that when Agave¹ is carrying in her hands the head of her unhappy son which she has cut off, she seems even then to herself to be mad?

Horace. I am ready to confess to folly—let me pay that tribute to truth—and madness into the bargain. Expound to me only this: what do you think my special mental disease?

Damasippus. Let me tell you. First, you build. This means, you ape full-grown people though you are a dwarf², two foot high and all in proportion. Yet you are the man to laugh at the spirit and gait of poor Turbo the gladiator as too big for his body. How are you less laughable than he? Is it right that whatever Maecenas does you should do too, so different as you are and such a poor match for him?

In the absence of their mother some little frogs had been trampled under the foot of a calf. One having escaped relates to its mother how a huge beast had crushed its brothers to death.

¹ The mother of Pentheus, whom in her Bacchic frenzy she tore to pieces.

² A figure, but in playful allusion to the fact that he was really man of small stature. See the end of Epist. 1. 20.

How large, she asks, had it been? so large?—puffing herself out.

‘Half as big again.’

As much bigger as this?

As she puffed herself up more and more, ‘if you puff till you burst’ he says, ‘you will not be as large.’ The fable hits you off very neatly. Now throw in your poetry—in other words, throw oil on the furnace. If any one ever wrote poetry who was sane, then you are sane in writing it. I do not speak of your awful rages—

Horace. Stop there.

Damasippus. Your style of living, too grand for your estate—

Horace. Keep to your own business, Damasippus.

Damasippus. A thousand frenzies of foolish passion—

Horace. O master, be merciful to your humble imitator in madness!

IV

Unde et quo Catius?

Catius : or The art of dining.

Among the supreme pleasures of his country life Horace reckoned (see Sat. 2. 7) his escape from the vapid talk of a town supper-party. In this talk-as-it-should-not-be he gave a high place to talk about the cookery, and he devotes two Satires (this and the last Satire of this Book) to ridiculing persons who set up as connoisseurs in the art of gastronomy. The humour of the Satire lies perhaps in part in the selection of the interlocutor who (if we can trust the Scholiasts) is the Catius of Cicero's letters (ad Fam. 15, 16), an Epicurean writer—in any case, in the affectation of Lucretius's philosophical phraseology, and the suggestion which comes out in the last words, but which has been prepared for throughout, that we are hearing the teaching not only of the art of dining but of the art of living.

The precepts are miscellaneous, a mixture probably of platitudes and paradoxes. It is to be noticed that they follow the order of a Roman supper, 'from the eggs to the apples' (see p. 166).

Horace. WHENCE, and whither away, Catius? Catius. I have no time. I am in a hurry to set in order my notes of some new teaching such as will drive from the field Pythagoras and the¹ accused of Anytus and the learned Plato.

Horace. It is a crime, I confess, to have interrupted you at such a bad moment. I pray you, generously pardon me. If anything has slipped from you now you will recover it soon; for your memory is a marvel, whether of nature or of art.

Catius. Aye, that was what I was thinking of—how to keep it every word: for indeed they were nice points and handled throughout in nice style.

Horace. Reveal² to me the man's name, and also whether he is a Roman or a stranger.

Catius. The teaching itself I will utter² as I remember it—the teacher's name must be a secret.

Eggs of oblong shape remember to serve, as of

¹ Socrates.

² The words are chosen as though it was an oracle which was asked of and uttered.

better flavour and whiter than round ones: the white is firmer, and the yolk within belongs to the cock bird.

Kales grown on the dry lands are sweeter than from gardens near the city: nothing is more washy than the produce of your much-watered ground.

If a guest has surprised you in the evening, you will know what to do that the fowl disappoint not his taste by its toughness. Mix Falernian with the water and plunge the fowl alive into the kettle. This will make it tender.

Mushrooms grown in the open meadow are the best—others are untrustworthy.

He will pass healthy summers who shall finish his early meal with mulberries which he has gathered from the tree before the sun is hot.

Aufidius used to mix his honey with rough Falernian—a mistake; for when the veins are empty you should let nothing pass into them but what is soft: soft should be the draught with which you begin the meal.

If the habit is costive the mussel and other shellfish will be a cheap remedy, with groundling sorrel; but do not forget white wine of Cos.

The succulent shellfish are fuller at the new moon. But it is not all waters that yield the best kinds. The giant mussel of the Lucrine is better than the purple-fish of Baiae. Circeii is the home of oysters, Misenum of urchins. Soft Tarentum prides itself on its broad scallops.

But no one must lightly set up as professor of the art of dining unless he has first mastered the subtle theory of flavours. Nor is it enough to sweep fish indiscriminately from an expensive stall without knowing which are best boiled, and which, if broiled, will tempt a guest to eat till he is tired before he sinks back on his elbow¹.

A man who would not have flavourless meat must see to it that the wild boar which makes his round dish bend double is an Umbrian fed on acorns from the holm-oak. One from Laurentum is inferior. He has been fattened on reeds and rushes.

The roes that the vineyard rears are not eatable at all seasons. The wise man will take care to choose the fore-legs of the doe-hare, always in young. The natural condition and age for different kinds of fish and birds are points of study never cleared up by any taste before mine.

There are some whose genius is exhausted in inventing new kinds of pastry: but it is by no means enough to spend all one's trouble on a single department—just as if a man cared only to see that his wines were good, giving no thought to the quality of the oil with which he souces his fish.

Massic wine you may put out of doors in fine weather and the night air will refine anything that is coarse in it and its heady fumes will pass off. On the other hand, to strain it through linen spoils it and ruins the natural flavour. Surrentine the connoisseur mixes with some lees of Falernian, and clears it perfectly with a pigeon's egg, for the yolk sinks to the bottom and carries with it all foreign matter.

¹ Or 'tempt the jaded guest to raise himself again on his elbow.'

To the flagging drinker you will give fresh zest by fried prawns and African snails. Lettuce the stomach rejects, when it is hot after drinking wine. It desires to be freshened by the sharp sting rather of dried ham, rather of sausage. Nay, it would prefer any of the savoury dishes that are brought steaming from the coarse cookshops.

It is worth while to spend much study on the nature of the two kinds of sauce¹. There is the simple kind which consists of sweet olive oil. This you should mix with some rich wine and with pickled roe of the kind of which a Byzantine jar² has reeked. When this has been mixed with chopped herbs and boiled, sprinkled with saffron from Corycus and let stand, you will add besides some of the best oil from a Venafran press.

Apples from Tibur yield in flavour to those of Picenum, though in look they have the advantage.

Of grapes the Venuculan is best for the preserving jar: that of Alba is safer for smoke-drying. This last the inquirer learns that I set the example of serving at dessert, as I set the example of putting wine-lees with caviare, and of setting to each guest white pepper sifted with black salt in clean little salt-cellars. It is a gross fault to spend three thousand at the fish-market and then to squeeze the sprawling fish into a dish all too small for it. Again, it turns the stomach, if a waiting boy have handled the drinking cup with hands greasy from gobbling stolen morsels; or if the mixing bowl be an antique, but never cleaned. How much is the cost of a cheap broom, napkins, sawdust? Yet the offence of not supplying them is great. To see you sweeping your tessellated pavement with dirty palm-broom and putting covers that want washing over Tyrian stuffs! You forget that in proportion as the care and expense which these things involve is less, so any complaint about them is more just than about things which cannot be found save at a rich man's table.

¹ Or 'of the compound sauce.'

² Byzantium was the centre of the tunny fishery.

Horace. O learned Catius, by your friendship and by the gods I beg you, be sure to take me with you to hear the lecturer, however far you have to go. For however accurate the memory with which you relate them you cannot give me the same pleasure at secondhand. Then there is the look and manner of the man. You think little of seeing him, happy fellow, because you have had that good fortune: but to me it is a matter of no small anxiety to be able to approach the distant well-spring, and drink deep of the teaching of a happy life.

V

Hoc quoque, TiresiaTiresias: or Legacy-hunting.

An attack, more satirical than is usual with Horace, in the sense of Satire as Juvenal understood it, on the base arts by which men made up to wealthy persons without natural heirs. It is lightened by being thrown into the form of a burlesque continuation of the dialogue between Ulysses and the shade of Tiresias in Odyssey 11. The starting-point is the words of Tiresias (v. 114, Butcher and Lang's translation): 'Late shalt thou return in evil plight with the loss of all thy company, on board the ship of strangers, and thou shalt find sorrows in thy house, even proud men that devour thy living.'

The art of legacy-hunting has never been wholly unknown, but its prevalence belongs (as does the bitterness of tone with which 'heirs' are spoken of in Horace's writings) to the time when a disinclination to marriage and its responsibilities was a marked feature of social life.

Ulysses. THIS one question answer me, Tiresias, besides what you have told me. By what arts and methods can I recover my lost substance? Why do you laugh?

Tiresias. Have we come to this, that a man of craft such as yours is not satisfied to be brought back to Ithaca, and to look on his home-gods?

Ulysses. O teller of truth to all, you see that as you prophesied I am returning to my home stripped bare of all things; and there neither storeroom nor flock has been left unrifled by the suitors. And yet, without substance, blood and valour are more valueless than seaweed.

Tiresias. Since, to put things plainly, poverty is what you dread, let me tell you how you can grow rich. If a fieldfare or any other dainty be given you for your own eating, let it wing its way to the place where there is the splendour of a large fortune with an aged owner. Your sweetest apples and any special pride of your trim farm, before the Lares one worthy of more reverence than the Lares, the rich man, must taste. He may be a perjured man, a man without birth, one stained with a brother's blood, a runaway slave, yet if he ask you to walk abroad with him, do not refuse to give him the wall side.

Ulysses. I to give the wall to some scum of a Dama¹ !
That was not my way at Troy. I held my own against my betters.

Tiresias. Then you will be a poor man.

Ulysses. Well, I shall bid my heart be brave² and endure this. I have borne even greater things in my time. But do you go on, prophet, and tell me how I am to pile up wealth and heaps of money.

Tiresias. I have told you, and repeat it. Fish cunningly in all waters for legacies from old men. If one or two are clever enough to bite off the bait and escape your snares, do not for that abate your hope, or for the disappointment drop your profession. If by-and-by a case large or small is before the court, choose the suitor who is rich and without children ; though he be an impudent villain who is wantonly forcing a lawsuit on a better man than himself, take his side : laugh to scorn the citizen who has the advantage both in repute and in case, if he has a son alive or a wife capable of bearing one. Say ‘Quintus,’ we will suppose, or ‘Publius,’ —sensitive ears are tickled by the praenomen—‘your virtues have made me your friend. I understand the law with its ambiguities. I can defend a case. I will let any one pluck out my eyes sooner than that he should set you at nought, or rob you of a nutshell : this care belongs to me to see that you are not cheated or made

¹ i. e. a slave.

² In reference to the words of Ulysses in Odyss. 20. 18 (Butcher and Lang): ‘Endure my heart ; yea, a baser thing thou once didst bear.’

fun of.' Bid him go home and nurse himself; act yourself as his representative; persist and persevere, whether

'the red Dog-star's heat Split the dumb statues,' or (after a full supper of rich tripe) *Furius*¹, like Jove,

'bespit the wintry Alps with hoary snow.'

'Do you not see,' some one will say, nudging his next neighbour, 'how untiring he is, how keen to serve his friends?' More tunnies will swim within reach, and your fishpond will fill. Then again, for fear you should show your hand too plainly by making up to a bachelor, look for a case where on a fine property a sickly son is being reared as heir: there by constant attention feel your way gently to what you desire, that if the boy lives you may be the second legatee, and if some accident have sent him to another world you may fill his vacant place. This hazard seldom disappoints. If a man hand you his will to read, be sure to refuse, and push the wax tablets from you: yet do it so that by a side glance you may catch the purport of the second line of the first tablet². Run your eye rapidly along it to see whether you are sole heir or one of many. Not once only the commissioner³ who has gone into the melting-pot and come out a clerk will cheat the raven

¹ For these quotations from Furius Bibaculus see note on p. 201.

² The first line contained the name of the testator, the second those of the legatees.

³ Lit. 'one of five,' possibly the five who superintended the night police.

that opens its mouth, and a Nasica the will-hunter will make sport for a Coranus.

Ulysses. Are you gone mad? or are you purposely making fun of me with your dark oracle?

Tiresias. O son of Laertes, whatever I say will be or will not be; for mighty Apollo gives me the gift of prophecy.

Ulysses. I dare say: but tell me, if you please, the purport of the story you speak of.

Tiresias. What time a young hero, the terror of the Parthians, whose blood comes down from great Aeneas, shall be winning fame by land and sea, the tall daughter of Nasica, who never pays in full if he can help it, shall give her hand to the bold Coranus. Then and not before the new son-in-law shall do this: he shall give to his father-in-law some tablets and pray him to read them. After many refusals Nasica at length shall take them and read them to himself, and shall find that nothing is left to him and his but to weep. I have one more hint: if there chance to be a crafty woman or a freedman looking after a dotard, strike a partnership with them. Praise them that they may praise you behind your back: this too is a help. But much the best way is at once to take by storm the principal himself. If he is an idiot who writes bad verses, praise them. . . .

I will tell you something that happened while I was an old man. A determined old woman at Thebes was carried out to her burial, according to her will, in this way: her corpse was oiled all over, and her heir carried it on his bare shoulders. She wished to see (you understand) whether when she was dead she could slip through his fingers. I suppose when she was alive he had pressed her too hard. Begin with caution; let zeal be neither lacking, nor yet unmeasured and excessive. One who talks too much will offend the testy and morose. You should not go to the other extreme and be silent. Be the Davus of the comic stage: stand with bent head, for all the world as if you were shy. Make your first approaches by civility. Warn him, if the wind has freshened, to be careful and cover his precious head. Shoulder a way for him out of a crowd. Hold your ear at his service when he wants to chatter. Is he eager in season and out of season for praise? Press him with it till he lifts his hands to heaven and cries 'hold!' The more you see the bladder rise, ply the more the bellows of flattery.

When he shall have released you from your long servitude and anxiety, and, with the assurance that you are not dreaming, you shall have heard the words, 'One-fourth I give and bequeath to Ulysses.' 'Is my old companion Dama really no more? where can I find another so worthy and so true?'—let fall such utterances now and then, and if you can possibly manage a few tears, shed them at the news: you can hide your face if it betrays your joy. If the tomb is left to your discretion, build it handsomely: let the neighbourhood praise the brilliance of the funeral. If by chance any of your co-heirs is older than you and has a nasty cough, assure him that if he would like to buy an estate or a town-house which belongs to your share you would gladly let him have it for a nominal price.

But Proserpine summons me, and I must obey. Long life and health to you !

VI

Hoc erat in votis

The Mountain stronghold: or Country and Town.

The Satire will be compared especially with Sat. 1. 6, as completing the picture there given of Horace's mode of spending a day in Rome, and with Epist. 1. 14 and the beginning of 16 for the description of his country life and of the Sabine farm in which much of it was spent.

THIS used to be among my prayers—a portion of land not so very large, but which should contain a garden, and near the homestead a spring of ever-flowing water, and a bit of forest to complete it. The gods have done more amply and generously. I ask for nothing more, O son of Maia, than that thou make these gifts indeed my own. If I neither have made my estate larger by any evil practice, nor mean to make it smaller by fault or failing; if I make no such foolish prayers as these: ‘Oh, if I could throw in that adjoining corner that spoils the shape of my little farm! Oh, if some chance might direct me to a jar of silver, like the hireling who found a treasure, and bought and ploughed as its owner the field in which he found it, a rich man by grace of his friend Hercules!’—if what I have pleases and contents me—then this is the boon I ask of thee: make my cattle fat, and all else that their master has except his wit, and be ever as of yore my chiefest guardian!

So now, when I have got me safely from the town to my mountain stronghold, what before it should I sooner glorify in my Satires with my Muse that goes afoot? Here no affectation of state vexes me to death; no leaden sirocco in the deadly autumn weather which makes the fortune of hateful Libitina.

O Father of the morning, or Janus if so thou wouldst rather be called, from whom men take the beginning of all the tasks and toils of life,—so the gods will,—be thou the source of my song! At Rome thou hurriest me to give bail for a friend: ‘Come quick, that none be before you in answering the call.’ Go I must, whether the north wind be sweeping the earth, or winter with narrower arc contract the snowy day. When I have uttered, as bidden, ‘aloud and distinctly¹,’ what may be to my own harm one day, I have to struggle in the crowd and do damage to those who are not quick enough for me. ‘What do you want, you madman? what are you about?’ repeats an unreasonable man with angry imprecations, ‘are you, sir, to thrust and push any one that is in your way in your hurry to get back to an engagement that you remember with Maecenas?’ Aye, there² is the pleasure, the sweetening of the cup—I will say the truth. But as soon as one reaches the gloomy Esquiline, a hailstorm is dancing over head and ears, in front and on flank, a hundred questions of other people's business: 'Roscius begs you will give him your presence to-morrow before eight o'clock at the puteal:' 'The Civil Servants beg you, Quintus, not to forget to come down again to-day to the Forum on some fresh and serious business which concerns you and them¹:' 'Pray get Maecenas to put his seal to this little document.' If you say 'I will do my best,' 'You can, if you will' he urges.

¹ Apparently from the formula of the clerk of the court calling on a witness.

² i. e. in the relation to Maecenas.

It is now seven, or more nearly eight years since Maecenas began to count me among his acquaintance, to the extent at least of offering me sometimes a seat in a carriage on a journey, and trusting to my ears chitchat such as this, 'What o'clock is it?' 'Do you think Gallina the Thracian is a good match for Syrus?' 'The morning frosts have a sting now if you are not careful,'—and other things as safely stored in a leaky ear. All through this time our friend has been daily and hourly more and more the mark for envy. He had shared Maecenas's seat at the games: he had played with him in the Campus—'Fortune's own son' they all cry. Some rumour is sending a shiver through the town from the Forum to each place where men meet; every one that runs against me asks my opinion: 'Oh, my good sir, you must know—you live so near the gods: have you heard anything about the Dacians?' Nothing whatever. 'How you like, and always will like laughing at us!' May all the gods confound me, if I have heard a word! 'Well, about the lands which Caesar has promised the soldiers—does he mean to give them in the three-cornered island or on Italian soil?’ When I swear that I know nothing, they marvel at me as a man, surely, in a thousand for unusual and profound reticence. In such occupations, to one’s misery, one wastes the day, sighing all the time, O country home, when shall I look on you again! when shall I be allowed, between my library of classics and sleep and hours of idleness, to drink the sweet draughts that make us forget the troubles of life! Oh when shall I sit down to my beans, Pythagoras’ kinsmen¹, and with them the dish of garden stuff that wants no rich sauce beyond the fat bacon! O nights and suppers of gods! at which I and my friends with me feast ourselves before my own home-gods, and leave plenty of the food for my saucy home-born slaves. The guests mix the cups which they drink each after his several liking, for they are free from crack-brained rules. One has a strong head and chooses the fiery draught. Another prefers a more moderate tippie. And so the talk that comes naturally is not of smart houses in country or town which do not belong to us, nor of the merits of Lepos as a dancer; but we debate matters which come nearer home to us, and on which it is a misfortune to be ignorant—whether riches or virtue is the key of happiness, whether the attraction to friendship is interest or right, what is the nature of the good and what is the chief good. From time to time our neighbour Cervius in his easy way tells some nursery fable that hits the point. For instance, if any one praises the wealth of Arellius without knowing its anxieties, he begins thus: ‘Once upon a time, the story goes, a country mouse received as a guest in his poor hole a town mouse, an old friend whom he had entertained before. He lived roughly and had the soul of thrift; but he could unbend on occasions of hospitality. Need I say more? He grudged not his precious store either of round pease or of long oats, he even brought in his mouth a dried raisin and nibbled morsels of bacon, so eager was he by variety of fare to coax the dainty stomach of his guest, who in his lordly way just put his teeth first to one thing and then to another. Stretched on his sofa of fresh straw, the master of the house is making his own meal on spelt and tare, leaving the delicacies to his friend; when the townsman, getting impatient, cries to him: “What pleasure can you find, my friend, in living such a hard life on this wooded bank? Let me persuade you to prefer company and the town to these wild woods. Take my advice and start with me. Since all that is on earth is mortal, and there is no escape from death for great or small, draw the true conclusion, my dear sir, and live whilst you may in the enjoyment of what is pleasant; live, and remember how short the time is!” These words greatly impressed the countryman. He was out of doors in a trice. And so they make the best of their way to the town, in haste to creep safely within its walls under cover of night. Night was already at its zenith when they halted at a wealthy house, where scarlet coverlets were glowing on ivory couches, and a pile of dishes was standing in baskets, the remains of a great supper of that evening. Then the townsman assumes the host, and having made his friend stretch himself on a purple coverlet, hurries about like a waiter with his tunic tucked up, and serves course upon course without pause, and plays to the life the part of a home-bred slave, for he licks every dish before he hands it. The other, lying at his ease, is congratulating himself on his changed lot, and in happy case is playing the contented guest; when suddenly a noise of slamming doors made both leap from the sofas. Terror-stricken they scurry from end to end of the banqueting hall, their panic increasing momentarily as the house rang with the barking of Molossian dogs. Then is the countryman's turn: "This is no place for me," quoth he, "and so fare you well: my wood and my hole safe from surprises, and my humble vetch-pods, will satisfy my needs."

¹ Horace had himself held a place in the 'Civil Service' as a scriba in the Quaestor's office.

¹ See note on Epp. I. 12. It seems a complicated joke on three points in the philosophy of Pythagoras: (1) his doctrine of the transmigration of souls; (2) his vegetarianism; (3) a proverbial saying traced to him, ‘Abstain from beans.’ Horace suggests that the ground of the precept must have been the fear that in eating a bean you might without knowing it eat a kinsman.

VII

Iamdudum ausculto

Davus : or Freedom and slavery.

A companion Satire to the third of this Book. It deals with another Stoic 'paradox,' namely, that 'every one but the wise man is a slave.' Horace dramatizes the theme by putting it into the mouth of his own slave Davus, who avails himself of the licensed freedom of the Saturnalia (which were supposed to recall the equality of men in the golden age) to speak his mind as to his master's failings. On the one side we notice the good-humoured ironical way in which he turns the edge of his Satire upon himself. We are not to take his quasi-confession too literally here any more than elsewhere. On the other it must be allowed that (perhaps with the usual Roman lack of real dramatic instinct) he makes no attempt in the bulk of the Satire to make Davus speak in character. The style is the declamatory style of a Stoic lecturer, as in the case of Ofellus in Sat. 2 and Stertinus in Sat. 3.

Davus. I HAVE been listening a long time and wishing to say a few words in reply, but as a slave I hesitate.

Horace. Is that Davus?

Davus. Aye, Davus, a chattel with some affection for his master, and passably honest, though not quite too good to live.

Horace. Come, take full benefit of December's franchise—so our fathers have ruled it for us. Say your say.

Davus. A part of the world finds its pleasure consistently in vice and keeps steady to its purpose. Another and a larger part wavers, at one moment setting its hand to what is right, at another giving way to evil. Priscus, who attracted attention on many days by wearing three rings, sometimes by wearing none, was so variable that he never wore the same stripe ¹ two hours running. From a grand house he would plunge suddenly into quarters from which a freedman of any self-respect would be ashamed to be seen emerging. Now he followed the life of a rake at Rome, now that of a philosopher at Athens. Vertumnus¹ with all his thousand faces had frowned on his birth. Trencherman Volanerius on the other hand, when the well-deserved gout had crippled his own fingers, hired a journeyman to pick up the dice for him and put them in the box. Just as he was the more persistent in his course of vice, so he was the less to be pitied, and higher in the scale than one who suffers from having the rope now strained too tight, now hanging loose.

¹ He dressed now as a Senator with the broad stripe down the front of the tunic, now as a knight with the narrow one.

Horace. Shall you be the whole day before you tell me what all this stale stuff is about, you gallows-bird?

Davus. About yourself, is my answer.

Horace. In what way, you villain?

Davus. You praise old-world fortunes and old-world manners; and yet if some god offered to take you back to those times you would flatly refuse; either because there is no real feeling behind that loud talk, or because you are a weak-kneed champion of the right, and, in spite of vain desires to lift your foot from the mire, stick fast in it. At Rome you are all for the country: in the country you extol to the stars the distant town. There is fickleness for you! If you happen to have no invitation to sup out, you praise your peaceful meal of herbs, and call yourself a lucky man, and hug yourself that you have not to go abroad to drink your wine—just as though when you went out anywhere you had to be dragged in chains ! Let Maecenas have sent you an invitation to his table about the time of lamp-lighting : ‘ Will no one make haste and bring the oil ? Is any one attending to me ? ’ you bluster and shout, and off you go. Mulvius and his brother trenchermen go their ways too, with a prayer not meant to be repeated to you : ‘ Yes,’ he would say, ‘ I confess that I am a poor creature, that must follow where my belly bids me. I open my nostrils at a savoury smell. I am weak, lazy, if you like you may add a glutton. Well, sir, and are you, though you are as bad and perhaps worse, to go out of your way to write Satires on us as though you were our better, and wrap up your own failing in decorous words ? ’ What if you betray yourself as more silly even than me, a slave who cost five hundred drachms ? Nay, do not try to frighten me by your looks. Keep a check on hand and temper while I reveal to you the lesson which Crispinus’¹ doorkeeper taught me. . . .

¹ The god of change.

Are you, in my eyes, lord and master, you who bow your neck to so many and such imperious calls of circumstance and of men—you whom the praetor’s rod² laid on your head three times or four times over cannot free from slavish fear ? Ask another question not less interesting—I do not care whether one who does the bidding of a slave should be called, as the custom of your world calls him, a ‘ deputy ’ or a ‘ fellow slave ’—

¹ Crispinus (see end of Sat. I. 1) is a Stoic lecturer. Davus professes to have picked up his philosophy from the lecturer’s doorkeeper.

² The form of manumission of a slave.

In either case what am I in your eyes? The truth is, you who domineer over me are the miserable slave of some one else, and are moved like a wooden puppet by strings in the hands of another.

Who then is free? The wise man alone, who is a stern master to himself, whom neither poverty nor death nor bonds affright, who has the courage to say 'no' again and again to desires, to despise the objects of ambition, who is a whole in himself, smoothed and rounded, with the surface on which nothing from outside can find lodgement, against whom, if she assail him, Fortune is crippled.

Can you recognize as your own any one of these traits? A woman asks four talents of you, bullies you, shuts her door in your face, drenches you with cold water, and then—invites you to come to her house again. Snatch your neck from the dishonouring yoke: 'I am a free man, a free man' say. You cannot do it; for there is a master, and no gentle one, driving your soul, goading you sharply if you are weary, and tugging at your mouth if you jib.

Again, when you are entranced by a picture of Pausias, how is your shortcoming less than mine when I stop to admire rough drawings in red ochre or charcoal of the encounters of Fulvius and Rutuba or Pacideianus with their straining haunches as if they were heroes really fighting, striking, and parrying by movement of their weapons? Davus is a 'worthless dawdler,' but you are a 'fine and accomplished critic of ancient art.' If I feel the attraction of a smoking cake I am a good-for-nothing. Do your own prodigious virtue and intelligence say 'no' to a dainty supper? Why is it more harmful to me to obey a gluttonous appetite than it is to you? You say that I pay the penalty with my back. But how do you escape punishment more than I, when you set your heart on dainty dishes which cannot be had without their price? The truth is that rich fare, indulged in without limit, turns bitter in the mouth; and the feet that have been made fools of refuse at last to support the bloated body. Is it a deep offence in a boy after a day's work to barter a *strigil*¹ of his master's for a bunch of grapes, and has the man nothing of the slave about him who breaks up an estate to gratify his gluttony? Say besides that at the same time you cannot bear your own company for an hour together, you cannot employ leisure wisely, you would give yourself the slip, a runaway and a vagrant, seeking now with wine, now with sleep, to cheat care. In vain: fast as you run, black Care is at your side or at your heels.

Horace. Who will find me a stone?

Davus. What do you want it for?

Horace. Are my arrows all gone?

Davus. Why, if the man isn't raving he is composing verses²!

Horace. If you don't take yourself off with all speed, you will be sent as a ninth hand to my Sabine farm.

¹ Used at the bath.

² Davus is supposed to notice both the word 'arrows' as though Horace were thinking in tragic style, and also the suggestion of metrical form.

VIII

Ut Nasidieni

Nasidienus Rufus : or An upstart's supper-party.

The motive of this Satire is in part the same as that of the fourth of this Book, the talk about eating which Horace found so odious : but a new and dramatic turn is given to the subject by putting this talk into the mouth of a vulgar personage (the name of Nasidienus Rufus is no doubt a disguised one) who invites Maecenas to supper, asks three leading literary men to meet him, and then entertains them with disquisitions on cookery which at last tire their patience so much as to drive them from table.

It is interesting to notice, when we seem to be coming into close contact with Maecenas, that beyond the fact of his presence we hear nothing of him. Fundanius, who describes to Horace the scene of the supper, is the Comic Poet praised in Sat. I. 10. Four of those pests of a Roman entertainment, the 'scurrae,' the hangers-on of the tables of the great, are present ; two brought according to custom as uninvited guests by Maecenas, and two supporting the host. Nasidienus puts one of the latter into his own place next the chief guest. The party is arranged on three couches.

Horace. WELL, how did you like the supper with our lucky friend Nasidienus? When I came to ask you to sup with me yesterday I was told that you were at an early entertainment there.

Fundanius. Vastly. I never in my life enjoyed myself more.

Horace. Tell me, if you do not mind, what was the first dish to appease your ravenous appetites?

Fundanius. First came a wild boar. It was a Lucanian, and was caught, so the father of the feast told us, when the south wind was blowing softly. The table was garnished with salads and all things that whet the appetite, skirwort, fish-pickle, lees of Coan. When these were removed, a bustling page wiped well the maple-wood table with a purple napkin, while another gathered up the scraps and anything that could offend the guests. Then, like an Attic maiden bearing the sacred emblems of Ceres, came in procession a dusky Indian with Caccuban wine, a Greek with Chian that had not been brined¹. Then the host: 'If Alban, Maecenas, or Falernian is more to your taste than what is served, there are both.'

Horace. Ah for the sorrows of wealth! But I am anxious to know, Fundanius, what was the company with which you shared your enjoyments?

Fundanius. I was at the top: next to me Viscus of Thurii, and below him, if I remember rightly, Varius.

¹ It seems to have been the custom with certain wines to add a little salt water.

On the middle couch Maecenas and the two 'shadows'¹ whom he had brought with him, Vibidius and Servilius Balatro. On the host's couch, Nomentanus² above him, and below him Porcius², who made us laugh by swallowing his cheesecakes whole at a mouthful. Nomentanus was so placed for the purpose of pointing out with his forefinger anything that might escape [Maecenas'] notice: for the rest of us, the undistinguished crowd, sup at hazard on birds, shellfish, fish, whose look was no key to their unfamiliar taste; as I, for instance, very soon found out when I was handed the inside of a plaice and a turbot, a dish I had never before tasted. After this he explained to me that honey-apples have red cheeks if they are gathered under a waning moon. What difference this makes, you must ask himself. Then Vibidius whispers to Balatro, 'we shall die unavenged if we do not drink him out of house and home'; and asks for larger cups. At this the host's face changed and grew pale: for he dreaded nothing so much as hard drinkers, either because their tongues are too free, or because hot wines dull the fine edge of the palate. Vibidius and Balatro tilt whole wine-jars into the Allifan ware³. All followed suit, save the guests on the host's couch, who took care to spare the flagons.

Then is brought in a lamprey at all its length on a dish, with shrimps swimming in sauce round it. On this the host: 'It was caught' says he 'before spawning. The flesh is less good if it is taken later. The ingredients of the sauce are these: oil from Venafrum of the first pressing, pickled roe of the Spanish fish¹, wine five years old, but of home growth, stirred in while it is simmering,—when it has cooled Chian suits better than anything else,—white pepper, and plenty of vinegar made from the fermenting of the grape of Methymna². It is a recipe of my own invention to add while it is simmering green rockets and sharp-tasted elecampane; Curtillus bids add sea-urchins that have not touched fresh water; for what the shellfish from the sea yields of itself is something better than any prepared pickle.'

¹ Umbrae, 'shadows,' the name given to uninvited guests brought in the train of a great man.

² Two fictitious names, one the stock name in Satire for a spendthrift, the other implying greedy ways.

³ Allifae was a town in the valley of the Volturnus, where, according to the Scholiast, cups were made of special size.

Just at this juncture the awning above us fell heavily upon the dish, bringing down with it a cloud of black dust worse than what the north wind raises on the plain of Campania. We feared that something greater was coming; but recover ourselves when we find that there was no danger. Rufus [i.e. Nasidienus] laid his head on the table and wept as if his son had been cut off in his prime. I know not what would have been the end, if Nomentanus had not restored his friend by a philosopher's reflections: 'Ah Fortune, what divine power is more cruel towards us than thou! How thou delightest ever to make sport of human affairs!' Varius could scarcely control his laughter by use of his napkin.

¹ Said to be the mackerel.

² In Lesbos.

Balatro, who has a sneer for everything, says, 'Such are the conditions of life; and this is why fame will never give full response to your efforts. To think that in order that I may be entertained sumptuously you should be racked with every kind of anxiety, lest the bread be over-baked, lest the sauce be ill-seasoned, that every waiting boy be girt and trimmed according to rule! And then think of such accidents as these—if the awning fall as it did just now, if a clownish boy slip and break a dish! But as with a commander, so with a host—it is rough weather that discovers the genius, fair weather puts it out of sight.' Nasidienus replies, 'Heaven answer all your prayers, for a kind and courteous guest as you are!' and he calls for his slippers¹. Then on each of the couches you might notice a buzz of whispering, one into another's ear. I know of no show that I would rather have seen.

Horace. Pray, tell me, what was your next amusement?

Fundanius. While Vibidius is asking the waiters whether the flagon had been broken also, and while we are laughing at pretended jests, Balatro giving us our cue, back you come, Nasidienus, with altered countenance, as one that means to let art mend fortune. Presently there enter waiters bearing on a huge platter a crane dismembered and sprinkled plentifully with salt and meal, and the liver of a white goose fattened on figs, and hares' wings separated, as much nicer so than if you eat them with the back. Then we had the sight of blackbirds served with the breast burnt, and pigeons the hind part taken off—nice things enough, if the host would not explain at length the philosophy and natural history of each of them. But we fled from him and had our revenge by tasting absolutely nothing, as though it had all been poisoned by Canidia's breath worse than that of Afric's serpents.

¹ i. e. to leave the table. Guests lay with their feet bare.

EPISTLES

BOOK I

I Prima dicte mihi
To Maecenas.

A dedication of the new Book to Maecenas. It is an apology (1) for his abandonment of lyric poetry, (2) for the tone and subjects which will characterize the Epistles.

YOU were the theme of my earliest Muse, Maecenas, and must be of my latest; but what you are asking is to shut on me again the door of the training school, though I have already sufficiently passed the test and received my wooden sword¹. My years are not what they were, nor is my inclination. Veianius hangs up his arms at the door of the temple of Hercules and then hides himself out of sight in the country. He does not desire to have again and again to appeal to the people² from the edge of the lists. There is a voice that whispers ever in my ear, and my ear is purged to listen, ‘Be wise in time and turn your horse out to grass when he shows signs of age, lest he end in a ludicrous breakdown with straining flanks.’ So now I am laying aside verses among other playthings. My thoughts and my questions are of what is right, what is becoming. My whole soul is in these things. I am storing and ordering what one day I may bring out for use. If you ask who is my chief, in what home

¹ The gladiator’s wooden sword, which was used for practice, and given him on retirement as a token of discharge.

² i. e. for discharge.

I find shelter, I am not bound over to swear allegiance to any master: where the wind carries me, I put into port and make myself at home. At one moment I become the man of action and plunge in the troubled waters of civil life, the unbending champion and henchman of strict Virtue. At another I slip back, when no one is looking, to the rules of Aristippus and would try to suit life to myself, not myself to life. As the day seems long to those whose labour belongs to another, as the year crawls¹ to minors burdened by a mother's irksome tutelage, so slow-flowing and thankless to me are the spaces of time which defer my hope and purpose of setting vigorously to that work which, if performed, profits equally the poor and the rich, if neglected, will injure by-and-by equally the young and the old. Meanwhile, for my own self I am fain to find guidance and solace in such child's-teachings as these. You may not be able to make your eyesight reach as far as Lynceus²; you would not on that account think scorn of putting salve to your eyes if they were sore. Because you do not hope for the fame of Glycon, the champion athlete, you would not refuse to take exercise enough to keep at bay the gout. You may advance a certain way, if you may not get further.

Is avarice, with its miserable desires, the fever of your soul? There are words and sounds of power by which you may assuage the pain and quit yourself in large part of the disorder¹. Have you the dropsy of ambition? There are fixed forms of atonement: read the book piously thrice through, and they will have power to make you yourself again. The envious, the angry, the lazy, the sot, the rake—none is so wild that he cannot become tame, if only he lend a patient ear to treatment. To flee vice is the beginning of virtue, and the beginning of wisdom is to have got rid of folly. You see with what vast effort and risk of life you strive to avoid what you think to be the greatest of evils, a small income or the disgrace of defeat at the polls². You are indefatigable in sailing as a trader to the utmost Indies, for from poverty you would fly through sea, through rocks, through fire. To save yourself from trouble over the things which you foolishly admire and wish for, are you not willing to learn and listen and trust one wiser than yourself? What hack prize-fighter at village shows and town gathering-places would think scorn of a garland at Olympia if he had the hope, if he had the offer, of the palm's delight without the dust? Well, as gold is worth more than silver, so is virtue than gold³.

¹ Shakespeare's 'Time travels in divers paces with divers persons.'

² The keenest-sighted of the Argonauts.

‘O fellow citizens, fellow citizens, money is the first thing to seek : virtue after money !' this is the lore which the Janus-arches¹ teach from end to end : this is the repetition-lesson which the young have on their lips—yes, and the old too, like schoolboys 'with satchel and tablets slung on left arm².'

¹ The teachings of philosophy are likened to the spells with which the leech of antiquity eked out his medical art.

² The two follow the order of the two vices named above, avarice and ambition.

³ The explanation of the parable of the prizefighter. ‘You who spend such infinite pains to make money may have the much greater prize of virtue for nothing.’ With this is contrasted the parrot-cry of the business world, ‘O fellow citizens,’ &c.

You have wit, you have character, a tongue at once and truth. Yes, but six or seven thousands are wanting to the four hundred³ : so you will be one of the crowd. Yet schoolboys in their game say 'Do right the thing and you'll be king⁴.' Be this your wall of brass, to have no guilty secrets, no wrong-doing that makes you turn pale. Tell me, pray, which is wiser, the law of Roscius⁵, or the schoolboys' burden which offers the title of king to those who 'do the thing right'—the burden so often on the lips of true men like a Curius and a Camillus? Does he advise you better who bids you make 'money, money by right means if you can, if not, by any means money,' and all in order that you may have a seat further forward at the doleful plays of Pupius ; or he who in time of need exhorts you—yes, and helps you to fit yourself—with free soul and erect to defy the tyrant Fortune?

¹ The chief place of business.

² Repeated from Sat. i. 6 (p. 188), 'like the schoolboys I described tripping to school at Venusia.'

³ The property qualification for the equestrian order.

⁴ A jingle used by schoolboys in some old game, and afterwards employed as a proverb. The nature of the game, and the exact bearing of the words, are not recorded.

⁵ The law which gave special seats at the theatre to all whose property reached the knight's standard. See Epod. 4.

But if the populace of Rome should by chance ask why I am not glad to take my share in its opinions as I take my share in its colonnades, why I neither follow nor avoid what itself loves or hates, I shall answer as the wary fox in the fable answered the sick lion: 'Because I am frightened at seeing that all the footprints point towards your den and none the other way.' Yes, you are a wild beast—and a many-headed one. For what am I to follow, or whom? Half the world is greedy to take public contracts. Then there are some who, with tit-bits and presents of fruit, angle for miserly widows¹, and catch old men to stock their preserves. Many have a fortune which grows in the dark² by usury. But let us grant that some are attracted by some objects and tastes, some by others; can the same persons persist in a single purpose for an hour together? 'There is no bay on earth that outshines lovely Baiae!' If so the rich man has said, lake and sea smart for the fancy of the eager owner. But by to-morrow, if his caprice shall have given the signal, you will be carrying off your tools, my men, to Teanum. If he has the bed of the genius³ in his hall; 'nothing is better' he says, 'nothing happier than a bachelor's life.' If he has not; then he swears that the married alone know what bliss is. With what knot shall I hold fast this Proteus of changeableness? And what of the poor man?

¹ Cf. Sat. 2. 5.

² Horace's phrase for 'unearned increment.'

³ A bed set in the atrium, which was the sign that the owner of the house was a married man.

You may well smile : he changes his garret, his bed, his bath, his barber. He hires a boat, and is as sick in it as the rich man who sails in his three-banked yacht. If I have come in your way with my hair trimmed by a barber who cuts unsteadily, you laugh at me. If under a trim tunic there chance to show a worn vest, or if my gown sits evenly and awry, you laugh at me. What when my judgement is at issue with itself, spurns what it sought, and asks again for what it let slip, sways to and fro like a tide and is a succession of incongruities, pulls down, builds up, changes square to round? Do you think it only a fashionable form of madness, and neither laugh at it nor pronounce me to need either a doctor or a guardian appointed by the Court, though you are my protector, though you are cross if a nail is cut awkwardly, though your friend depends on you and looks in everything to you?

¹ The sum of it all is, the wise man ranks only second to Jove. He is rich, free, honoured, beautiful, king (in fine) of kings—above all, he is sound, except when the phlegm troubles him.

II Troiani belli scriptorem To Lollius.

Some thoughts on life and morals, such as in the last Epistle he represents himself as storing. They are brought out now for the benefit of a young friend.

¹ The conclusion is ironical. ‘You see that I am falling into the very tone of platitude and paradox which I am always laughing at in the Stoic lecturers.’

Homer's poems offer the text, but when Horace has got to his sermon he does not go back to them.

WHILE you have been practising declamation¹ at Rome, Lollius Maximus, I have been reading again at Praeneste the story-teller of the war of Troy; who shows us what is fair, what is foul, what is profitable, what not, more plainly and better than a Chrysippus or a Crantor.

Why I have come thus to believe, let me explain, if you are not too busy to listen. The story, which tells how on account of the amour of Paris Greece and the barbarian world met in a stubborn war, is made up of the heats of foolish kings and peoples. Antenor advises to cut off at the root the cause of the war. What says Paris? That to enjoy his kingdom in peace and his life in happiness—no power shall compel him. Nestor would fain compose the quarrel between the sons of Peleus and of Atreus. Love is the fire that kindles one, anger the other, each with a common fury. For every folly of their princes the Greeks feel the scourge. Faction, craft, wickedness, and the lust and anger from which it springs—these are the sources of wrong-doing within the walls of Troy and without them.

Again, of the power of virtue and of wisdom he has given us a profitable example in Ulysses, the² 'far-seeing tamer of Troy who looked on the cities and manners of many men, and whilst making good for himself and his comrades their homeward journey over the broad sea, endured many hardships, but could never be drowned in the waves of adversity.' You know the tale of the Sirens' songs and the cups of Circe, which if he had drunk foolishly and greedily, as his comrades did, he had been the shamed and witless victim of the harlot mistress, and had been turned into a dog in uncleanness or a sow that loves the mire. We are the ciphers, fit for nothing but to eat our share of earth's fruits, the worthless suitors of Penelope and young courtiers of Alcinous, more busy than enough in keeping their skin sleek, whose standard of honour it was to sleep till midday and to beguile care to forgetfulness to the sound of the cithern.

•¹ In a school of rhetoric.

² A free translation of the first lines of the Odyssey.

To cut men's throats, robbers rise in the night. To save yourself alive, can you not wake? But as surely as, if you will not take exercise in health, you will have to do it when you have the dropsy; so surely if you will not ask for a book and a candle before daybreak, if you will not set your mind steadily on honourable studies and pursuits, you will lie awake on the rack of envy or passion.

Why are you in such a hurry to take out of your eye what hurts it, while, if something is eating into your very soul, you put off till next year the time for attending to it? He who has begun his task has half done it. Have the courage to be wise. Begin! He who keeps putting off the moment of reform is like the countryman waiting for the river to run by. But the river slides and rolls, and will slide and roll on to all time. You are busy, you say, making money, finding a wife to be a fruitful mother of children ; or you have forest land in process of being tamed by the plough-share. Well, when a man has enough, he should wish for no more. It is not town house or land, it is not a pile of brass or of gold, that ever freed their owner's sick body from fever or sick mind from care. The possessor must be in sound health if he thinks to enjoy the property he has got together. To one who still desires or fears, a town house and estate give as much pleasure as pictures to one who has sore eyes, or warm wraps to the gouty, or the cithern to ears aching from need of the syringe. Unless the vessel is clean, everything you pour into it turns sour.

Think scorn of pleasures. It is a bad bargain to buy pleasure at cost of pain. The covetous is a beggar always. Try to find a definite limit to your wishing. The envious man grows lean because his neighbour thrives. The tyrants of Sicily never invented a torture worse than envy.

He who will not control his anger will presently wish that undone which irritation and the feelings of the moment have made him do in his hurry to satisfy his vengeful hatred. Anger is a short madness. Rule your passion. Unless it obeys, it governs. Bridle it—chain it down, I pray you. While the horse is teachable and his neck is tender, the trainer breaks him in to go as the rider directs. The hound who does service in the forest began his hunting by barking at the stuffed stag's hide in the yard. Now while you are a boy with clean heart drink in my words, now let yourself be guided by your betters. The crock will long keep the fragrance with which it was once steeped in early days. If, however, you loiter behind or push vigorously before, I neither wait for the laggard nor hurry to keep up with those that stride ahead.

III

Iuli Floræ

To Julius Florus.

Julius Florus, a young literary friend, is travelling on the staff of Tiberius (Tiberius Claudius Nero, the son of Livia, and so stepson of Augustus, and the future Emperor Tiberius), who had been sent on a mission to the East in the year B.C. 20 to place Tigranes on the throne of Armenia.

Another letter to him may be seen in Epist. 2. 2, which like this one assumes common literary interests between the correspondents, and holds up to Florus 'divine philosophy' as a better medicine of the soul than either literature or the ambitions of practical life.

I AM longing to know, Julius Florus, how far Claudius, the stepson of Augustus, has got in his campaign. Are you still lingering in Thrace by the Hebrus, bound in its snowy fetters, or by the strait that runs between the neighbouring towers¹, or on the rich plains and hills of Asia? What tasks has his lettered suite in hand? This is what interests me equally. Who claims the office of writing the exploits of Augustus? Who means to spread through long ages the story how he made war and peace? What of Titius, soon to be on all lips in Rome, who has not

¹ The Hellespont.

blenched at drinking from the fountain-head of Pindar, daring to despise the pools and streams which all use—how fares he? How often does he think of me? Is he studying under the Muse's high guidance to fit the measures of Thebes to a Latin lyre? Or is he storming and laying on the colour thick as a tragic writer? Tell me, what is Celsus about? He was warned, and he needs constant warning, to seek wealth that he can call his own, and to shrink from fingering any writings to which Apollo of the Palatine has given a home: lest, if by chance one day the flock of birds come to reclaim their own plumage, the poor little jackdaw, stripped of his stolen colours, set the world laughing at him. And for yourself—what are you venturing? Over what thyme-bed are you hovering on your nimble wing? Yours is no small gift; nor is it a plot that to your shame is untilled and bramble-grown. Whether you are sharpening your tongue for the courts, or furnishing yourself to give advice on points of civil law, or building delightful verse, you will win the first prize of the conqueror's ivy. But if you had the heart to leave behind your useless anodynes¹ for trouble, you would climb where heavenly philosophy would lead you. This is the task, this is the study at which we should all be busy, the little and the great, if we would make our life of value to our country and to ourselves. This too, when you write, you must tell me, whether you care for Munatius as much as you should. Or does your broken friendship, like a wound ill-stitched, close to no purpose and tear open again? Do you suffer still, in the fierceness of untamed necks, be it from hot blood or from inexperience of life? Wheresoever you are, you have no business to break the tie of brotherhood. A votive heifer is being fattened for the return of you both.

¹ Literally 'applications' (as poultices), meant to be hot, but 'which have no heat in them.' What the special anodynes were which Florus tried we cannot tell, whether wealth, ambition, luxury, &c.

IV

Albi, nostrorum

To Albius Tibullus.

Tibullus is the poet, and Horace seems to be suggesting to him the same virtue which he hints in the Ode (1. 33) addressed to him, viz. contentment.

ALBIUS, generous judge of my 'Talks¹,' what shall I tell myself that you are about just now in your country near Penum? Writing something to beat the little poems of Cassius of Parma? Or strolling in quiet thought through the health-giving forest with your heart on all that is worthy of a wise man and a good? You never were body without soul. The gods gave you beauty, gave you wealth, and the art of enjoyment. What further could even a fond nurse ask for a dear foster-child, if already he has the power to think wisely and to utter his thoughts—if favour, fame, and health belong to him abundantly, and 'a seemly household and a purse well lined²'? In a world of hope and care, of fears and angry passions, hold for yourself the belief that each day that dawns is your last : the hour to which you do not look forward will be a pleasant surprise. If you ask of myself, you will find me, whenever you want something to laugh at, in good case, fat and sleek, a true hog of Epicurus' herd.

¹ Sermones, Horace's own name for his Satires.

² Conington.

V

Si potes Archiacis

To Torquatus.

An invitation to a modest entertainment on the night before Caesar's birthday.

IF you can lie down to table on couches of Archias' making, and do not mind supping from a modest dish on a mess of vegetables, I shall look for you here, Torquatus, at sunset. Your wine will be what was bottled in Taurus' second year¹ between Minturnae in the marshes and Petrinum by Sinuessa. If you have anything better, you must bid it be brought, or else put up with my ordering. The hearth has been brightened this long while and the furniture made tidy for your eyes. Let be, as idle things, the hopes and rivalries of wealth and Moschus' cause². To-morrow is the holiday of Caesar's birthday, and gives excuse for lengthened sleep. Without paying for it we shall be able to make a long summer night of friendly talk. What is fortune to me, if I may not enjoy it? The man who for regard of his heir spares and stints himself more than he need is next door to a madman. I shall set you the example of drinking and scattering flowers, and shall not mind even if you think me a madcap. What changes are not wrought by good drinking! It unlocks secrets, bids hopes be certainties, thrusts the coward into the fray, takes their load from anxious hearts, teaches new accomplishments. The life-giving winecup, whom has it not made eloquent, whom has it not made free even in the pinch of poverty! That there be no mean coverlet or soiled napkin to cause grimace, that cup and platter be polished till you see your very self in them, that there be none to repeat out of doors what is said between trusty friends, that the company be chosen and seated to match well—these are the things which I charge myself to see to; a task that fits me, and a task of love. I shall ask Butra to meet you and Septicius, and, unless a better supper and preferable company detain him, Sabinus. There is room besides for several ‘shadows’¹ of your bringing; but the goat and her savours are close at hand when a party is too crowded. Do you write how large a company you like to meet; and then shirk your business; and, while your client waits in the front hall, give him the slip by the back door.

¹ T. Statilius Taurus was consul for the second time in B.C. 26, so the wine will be four or five years old.

² Some cause in which Torquatus was engaged. We hear in Od. 4. 7 of his eloquence.

VI

Nil admirari

To Numicius.

A philosophical essay, for the benefit of his friend, on the duty of choosing deliberately an ideal or chief good, and then pursuing it with thoroughness. The first suggested is the apathy, or freedom from disturbing emotions, recommended by the Epicureans. The length at which this is set out seems to imply that for the moment at any rate it catches Horace's fancy. After that, he takes the more usual division of ideals, and goes through them in succession—virtue, money, ambition, different forms of pleasure. As he passes to the ideals which he holds to be unworthy, the exhortations to their pursuit become ironical.

¹ See on Sat. 2. 8, p. 257.

NOUGH¹ to admire¹ is perhaps the one and only thing, Numicius, that can make a man happy and keep him so. There are those who can gaze with no tinge of awe at the sight of yonder sun and stars and seasons passing in their appointed revolution. What think you of what earth gives, or the sea which makes rich the Arabs and Indians at the world's end; what of public games, of applause and presents of the people's favour; in what fashion do you hold that these things should be regarded, with what feelings and countenance?

So with their opposites, he who fears them 'adores' them in nearly the same way as the man who desires them: in either case there is the disturbing flutter of the heart whenever the sight that was not expected amazes the one or the other. Whether his feeling be joy or pain, desire or dread, what does it matter, if, whenever he has seen aught better or worse than he expected, his eyes are riveted and heart and limbs alike are spellbound? The wise man would deserve the name of madman, the just of unjust, if they were to pursue even Virtue herself too far.

¹ Pope's translation has familiarized us with the phrase, but it hardly represents to the English reader the meaning of admirari, which is intended to cover any mental perturbation caused by external things, whether by way of wonder, awe, admiration, desire, or fear. Perhaps 'to think much of,' if somewhat clumsy, most nearly approaches the breadth of the phrase.

Go then¹, gaze in rapt 'admiration' at silver plate, at ancient marbles and bronzes, at works of art, at gems and Tyrian dyes: rejoice that a thousand eyes are looking at you as you speak: in busy industry be early in the Forum and late in coming home, for fear Mutus reap a larger harvest from the estate he got with his wife than you from your business, and (thought of shame, seeing his lineage is worse than yours!) he make you 'admire' him rather than you make him 'admire' you! But remember that, as time will bring forth to the sunshine what is now under the earth, so it will bury out of view what is now in the light: when you have been the familiar sight to all eyes in Agrippa's colonnade and on Appius' road, it still remains for you to go where Numa and Ancus have gone home before you.

If lung or reins are attacked by some acute malady, look about for some escape from the malady. So you would live for the true end (who would not?): then if Virtue only can secure you this, be bold, let delights be, and to work!

Suppose, on the other hand, you think Virtue so many words, and a sacred grove so many yards of timber²: then take care to be first in every harbour, to miss no bargain at Cibra or in Bithynia : round off a thousand talents ; as many again ; and let the third thousand be added, and what is wanted to make the heap four-square. Of course, you know, a wife and dower, credit and friends, even birth and beauty, are all in the gift of Queen Money : the goddess of persuasion and the goddess of love both honour the well-moneyed man. The king of the Cappadocians is rich in slaves, but lacks money—mind you are not as he. Lucullus (the story goes) was asked once if he could lend a hundred soldiers' cloaks for the stage. 'How can I possibly lend so many ?' he answers, 'but I will see and send as many as I have.' Presently he writes that he has five thousand cloaks in his house ; the man may take some or all. That is a mean house where there is not plenty that goes to waste, beyond the master's knowledge and for the service of thieves. So then if substance be what alone can 'make you happy and keep you so,' let this be the task that you are first to go back to, last to leave off.

¹ This, of course, is an ironical exhortation to do what, in the face of what has been said, is ridiculous. The absurdity is emphasized by recalling the transitoriness of all things human.

² i. e. if (in modern phrase) you are a 'materialist' all round.

If show and popularity make the favourite of Fortune, then let us buy a slave to tell us names, to nudge us on the left side and make us put out the hand over the weights¹ : 'this man has much influence in the Fabian tribe—that in the Velina. This man will give the rods to whom he will, or ruthlessly snatch away the curule ivory.' 'Brother, Father'—do not forget the title—according to their ages with ready courtesy make each your kinsman.

¹ A phrase of uncertain meaning, possibly of shaking hands with a tradesman across the counter. The scholiasts, however, say that pondera were the high stepping-stones by which people crossed a street.

If again 'living well' means dining well: then—the day dawns: off let us go whither our appetite leads us. Let us fish and hunt, but after the fashion of Gargilius in the story. He used in the morning to send a train of nets, hunting-spears, and slaves through the Forum when it was fullest, that in sight of the same crowd one mule out of the lot might bring home a wild boar which he had bought at a shop. Let us go to the bath crammed full of undigested food¹, with no thought of propriety, qualified for the register of Caere², like the worthless crew of Ulysses of Ithaca, who cared more for a forbidden pleasure than for their return to their country.

If, as Minnervmus tells us, without love and mirth is no pleasure, then spend your life in love and mirth.

Long life and health to you. If you know anything better than all this, be frank and let me share it. If not, live by these rules, as I try to do.

VII

Quinque dies

To Maecenas.

Patronage as it should and should not be.

The letter begins with Horace's excuses for breaking a promise to return to Rome, but the main purpose (for the letter is clearly written for public reading) is to give a picture of patronage honourable to patron and poet, such as that of Maecenas towards himself, and patronage as it should not be, as illustrated in the story of Philippus and Vulteius; of whom the former looked chiefly to his own amusement, the latter allowed himself to be taken out of his proper sphere and put in a false position.

¹ It was supposed to be a way of procuring a fresh appetite.

² A phrase equivalent to 'disfranchisement.'

FIVE days I promised you to be in the country, and here I am breaking my promise and letting you miss me all August. It is true. But if you would have me alive and in sound and good health, the liberty which you grant me when I am ill you will grant me, Maecenas, when I am afraid of being ill, while the first figs and the heat are furnishing the undertaker with his suite of black attendants, while every father and fond mother look pale with fear for their boys, and assiduity of courtesies and petty business of the Forum bring fevers in their train and break the seals of wills. But as soon as winter begins to fleck with snow the uplands of Alba your poet will go down to the sea, take care of himself, and shut himself up with his books. You, my dear friend, he will revisit with the zephyrs, if you will allow him so much, and with the first swallow.

In making me a rich man you have not acted as the Calabrian host inviting a guest to eat his pears: 'Eat some more, pray.' 'I have had enough.' 'But please take away as many as you like.' 'No, thank you.' 'They will be a welcome little present for your boys if you will take them.' 'I am as much obliged by your generosity as if you sent me away laden.' 'Well—as you please—if you leave them, they go into the pig-tub to-day.' The prodigal and fool gives what he despises and hates: seed so sown has always produced, and will always produce, a crop of ingratitude. The generous and wise professes to have his hand always open to the deserving, yet he does not forget the difference between real coins and counters. Deserving I shall try always to show myself, as becomes the merit of my benefactor. But if you wish me never to leave you, you must give me back the strength of lung, the black hair well down on the forehead, you must give back the charm of speech, give back the grace of laughter, and the lamentations, between our cups, over Cinara the saucy runaway.

Once on a time a half-starved little vixen¹ had crept through a narrow chink into a bin of corn, and when it had well fed was struggling in vain to get out again with its belly full. To it quoth a weasel hard by, 'If you wish to escape thence you must go back fasting to the narrow hole which you entered when fasting.' If this fable is addressed to me, I am ready to resign all I have. And do not think that I praise the sleep of the humble while my own belly is with fat capon lined. I have no mind to exchange my ease and freedom for the riches of the Arabs. You have often praised my modesty, and have been called my 'prince' and my 'father' to your face, and not a word more sparingly behind your back. Now see if I can cheerfully restore all you have given. 'Twas no bad saying of Telemachus, true child of enduring Ulysses, 'Horses² would be out of place in Ithaca, since it neither spreads into level courses nor is lavish of much herbage. Son of Atreus, I will leave your gifts, which befit yourself better than me.' Small things beseeem the small. My pleasure now is not in queenly Rome, but in leisurely Tibur or peaceful Tarentum.

¹ Vixens, outside Fable-land, do not eat corn, and Bentley, to save Horace's repute for natural history, wished to alter the text.

² A paraphrase of Homer's Odyssey 4. 601 foll.

As Philippus, vigorous and masterful and the famous pleader, was returning home from his business about two o'clock in the day, and complaining (for he was getting on in years) that he began to feel the Carinae¹ inconveniently far from the Forum, he saw (so the story goes) a man, who had just been clean-shaven, sitting in a barber's empty booth and quietly cleaning his nails for himself with a penknife. 'Demetrius' (this was the quick-witted boy who waited his orders), 'go and ask and bring me word where that man lives, who he is, what his estate, who his father or his patron.' He goes, and comes back with the answer that his name is Vulteius Mena, an auctioneer, of modest rank, of blameless repute, known at proper seasons to be busy and to be idle, to gain and to spend, finding his pleasure in his humble companions and a home of his own, and when business is over, in the games and the Circus. 'I should like to hear all you tell me from his own lips. Bid him come to supper.' Mena, to tell the truth, could not believe his ears. He said nothing, but wondered what it could mean. To be brief, 'No, thank you,' he answered. 'Do you mean the fellow refuses me?' 'He has the face to do so. He either thinks little of you, or he is afraid of you.' Next morning Philippus comes on Vulteius selling cheap wares to a humble crowd of men in their tunics¹, and hails him first. Vultei² makes his business, the bonds of one who works for hire, his excuse to Philippus for not having called on him in the morning, and finally for not having seen him first. 'Take it that I have pardoned you on condition that you sup with me to-day.' 'As you please.' 'You will come then after three o'clock. Meanwhile go and make your fortune as busily as you may.' So he came to supper, and after chattering on every topic, wise and foolish, is let go late to bed. When the fellow has been seen running often as a fish to the well-concealed hook, attending early levées like a client, and by this time a daily guest, he is invited to come as companion, when the Latin holidays² were fixed, to a country house not far from Rome. Mounted behind the ponies, he kept praising without stint or stay the soil, the air of the Sabine hills. Philippus marks and smiles, and, thinking only of his own ease and his own amusement from any quarter, offers him seven thousand sesterces as a present and seven thousand more as a loan, and so persuades him to buy a little farm. He buys it. Not to waste your time with too long a story, from a smart townsman he becomes a countryman, and has on his tongue nothing but furrows and vineyards. trains elms for the vines, kills himself over his busy work, and ages before his time with the desire of getting. But when he has lost his sheep by theft, his goats by sickness, when his crops have belied his hopes, his ox has been worked to death at the plough, enraged at his losses, he seizes a horse in the middle of the night and in wrath makes straight for the house of Philippus. As soon as Philippus sees him all rough and unshorn, 'You are too hard on yourself, I am sure, Vulteius,' he says, 'and too intent on your business.' 'By Pollux,' he answers, 'you would call me a miserable wretch, my patron, if you would give me my true name. But by your genius, by your right hand and household gods, I pray and beseech you, restore me to my former life.'

¹ A fashionable quarter of Rome where Philippus would have a house.

¹ As we should say, 'in their shirt-sleeves.'

² A holiday in each year at a time to be fixed by the Consul for the year. The law-courts would be shut during it.

Who once has seen how much what he has let go excels what he has sought should go back in time and return to what he left. The true course is that each should measure himself with the foot-rule which belongs to him.

VIII

Celso gaudere

To Celsus Albinovanus.

The purpose of the Epistle is to be looked for in the hint of the last line. Horace prepares for it, after his manner, by the half-ironical confessions which lead to it: 'You may say worse things of me than anything I suggest of you. I don't listen to my friendly critics, so I cannot expect you to listen to me.'

The person addressed is probably the Celsus of Epist. I. 3, another of the literary circle of Tiberius.

BEAR, my Muse, as I pray you, messages of greeting and good wishes to Celsus Albinovanus, the companion and secretary of Nero. If he shall ask after my doings, tell him that in spite of many fair promises my life is neither wisely ruled nor happy, not that hail has bruised my vines and heat blighted my olives, nor that I have herds sickening on some distant pasture ; but because with mind less sound than any part of my body, I yet care not to listen to anything or learn anything that can lighten its sickness, am affronted by my faithful physicians, angry with my friends for their anxiety to rescue me from my deadly lethargy ; because I pursue what hurts me, avoid what I fully believe would help me ; at Rome love Tibur, fickle as the wind, at Tibur Rome¹. Thereafter question him of his own health, his estate, his life—how he is in favour with the prince and his staff. If he says ‘well,’ first wish him joy ; presently remember to drop in his own ear this one word of advice, ‘As you bear your fortune, Celsus, so we shall bear you.’

IX

Septimius, Claudius

To Tiberius.

A letter of introduction addressed to the young prince. The tact and grace of it have always been admired. See the commendation and translation of it by Steele in the ‘Spectator,’ No. 493. Septimius is no doubt the friend to whom Od. 2. 6 is addressed. Horace therefore knew well whom he was commending.

SEPTIMIUS understands, I see, Claudius, as no one else does, how much you make of me : for when he asks, nay insists that I shall undertake to commend him and introduce him (if you will believe it !) to you as one worthy in mind and manners of the carefully chosen circle of a Nero—thinking, no doubt, that my part is that of a nearer friend,—he must see and know the extent of my power a great deal better than I do myself. I gave him plenty of good reasons for excusing me. But I feared that he would think that I was making myself out as less well off than I am, and on selfish grounds denying powers which I really possess. So to avoid an imputation of this graver fault I made up my mind to take the privileges of a town-bred assurance. So now, if you can see merit in the sacrifice of modesty to the claims of friendship, enter my friend's name on your list and believe all good of him.

¹ It is worth noting that when Horace is writing for a different purpose he says just the opposite of himself. Epist. 1. 14.

X

Urbis amatorem

To Aristius Fuscus.

Horace, in his country retreat, writes to Aristius Fuscus, still in Rome, in praise of country as against town life. This turns eventually into praise of moderation and contentment as against grandeur and the desire of wealth. Compare the Epistle with Ode 1. 22, addressed to the same person and with something of the same moral.

OUR greeting to Fuscus, who loves the town as we love the country. In this one point, you see, we differ much: but in all else nearly twin brothers with brothers' hearts (when one says 'no,' the other says 'no' too) we nod agreement like two old familiar doves. You keep the nest; I am full of the streams and lichen-touched rocks and woodland of the country which I love. Ask no more. I live and feel a king as soon as I have left behind what, amid favouring voices, you extol to the sky. Like the priest's runaway slave, I have no stomach for cakes : bread is what I want, and prefer now to honeyed wafers.

If our business is to 'live agreeably to nature¹,' and we must begin by choosing a place to live in, do you know any place to be preferred for happiness to the country? Is there any place where you can keep warmer in winter, where a pleasanter air tempers the Dog-star's rage and the Lion's passage when he has been frenzied by the sun's keen edge? Is there where churlish Care breaks less the thread of sleep? Does the grass smell less sweet or shine less brightly than mosaic of Libyan marble? Is the water purer which in town streets struggles to break its leaden pipe than that which hurries murmuring down the sloping stream-bed? You see that among your many-coloured columns you take pains to grow green trees, and you praise a town house which has a distant country view. If you drive nature out with a pitchfork, she will soon find a way back and, before you know it, will burst triumphantly through your foolish caprices.

The man who lacks the skilled eye to compare wool dyed at Aquinum with true Tyrian purple will not receive surer damage, or one nearer the life, than one who shall not be able to distinguish the false from the true. Whom prosperity has charmed too much, adversity will shatter. If you shall admire anything, you will be loth to lay it down. Flee grandeur : under a humble roof you may live a far happier life than kings and kings' friends. A stag had the better of a horse in fighting, and used to drive him from the pasture they had shared, until, worsted in the long contest, the horse begged the help of a man, and let him put the bit between his teeth. But from the day when, appealing to force, he parted from his enemy a conqueror, he never got the rider off his back or the bit out of his mouth. So one who for fear of poverty loses liberty, which is more precious than gold and silver, will carry a master for his shameless greed, and will be a slave all his life, because he will never learn the lesson of contentment. Like the shoe in the fable, when a man's circumstances do not fit him, if they are too large for his foot they will trip him up, if too small they will gall it. You will live I know, Aristius, like a philosopher, well contented with your lot; and you will not let me off unscolded when I seem to be gathering more than I want and never taking a holiday. A store of money is to each man either a master or a slave: but by rights it should follow the rope when it turns on the windlass, not turn the windlass itself.

¹ A Stoic catchword.

I am dictating this letter to you behind the crumbling shrine of Vacuna¹, happy in every point save that you are not with me.

¹ Identified probably with a temple of Victory which stood in the village now named Rocca Giovaue, close to the site of Horace's country house. Such a temple we know, from an inscription found on the spot, to have been restored in Vespasian's reign. Vacuna is said to have been the Sabine name of the goddess. But Horace is playing on the name as derived from vacare and its cognates, as though the phrase gave the idea of 'in holiday land.'

XI

Quid tibi visa ChiosTo Bullatius.

Among the forms of restlessness foreign travelling is one of which Horace more than once complains. Bullatius is to be thought of as still in the East, perhaps as having written a letter to which this is an answer, and in which, after the way of travellers, he has expressed an alternation of interest in what he saw and of weariness of travel.

WHAT thought you of Chios, my Bullatius, and of famous Lesbos? What of pretty Samos? What of Sardis, the royal home of Croesus? What of Smyrna and Colophon, greater or, if so it be, less than the world thinks them? Do all alike pale before the Campus and Tiber's stream? Or have you a hankering for one of Attalus' cities? Or are you by this time so tired of travelling by land and sea that you are prepared to sing the praises even of Lebedus:—'You know what Lebedus¹ is, a town more deserted than Gabii and Fidenæ: yet I could find it in my heart to live there, and, forgetting my friends and forgotten by them, to gaze from a safe distance ashore on Neptune's wild play'? Yet as the traveller who is bound for Rome from Capua will not wish, because now he is drenched with rain and bespattered with mud, to spend a lifetime in the wayside inn,—as the man who takes a hot bath when he is chilled through does not praise it as a full security for a life happy at all points,—so neither will you, because boisterous Auster has tossed you on the sea, for that reason sell your ship on the other side of the Aegean. To a sound man Rhodes and fair Mytilene are what a travelling cloak is in summer, what light drawers are when a snowy wind is blowing, what the Tiber is in mid-winter, what a stove in the month of August. So long as you may, so long as Fortune wears a smiling face, stay in Rome: praise Samos and Chios and Rhodes; but praise them at a distance. Whatever happy hour God has given you take, my friend, with grateful hand; and do not put off enjoyment from year to year: so that, wherever your lot be cast, you may say that you have lived as though life were worth living. For, if what takes away care be reason and prudence, not a place that commands a wide sea-view, they change their sky, not their soul, who run across the sea. We work hard at doing nothing: we seek happiness in yachts and four-horse coaches. What you seek is here—is at Ulubrae¹—if an even soul does not fail you.

¹ A town of Ionia with a history, but which had been desolated about 300 B.C.

XII

Fructibus Agrippae

To Iccius.

The Epistle has the interest of bringing together two friends of the poet whom we know in the Odes; see Od. 1. 29 and 2. 16. He writes partly to commend Grosphus, who, as the Ode indicates, had property in Sicily, to Iccius, who is in charge of Agrippa's Sicilian estates. Iccius has apparently complained to Horace that he is managing another person's property instead of possessing one of his own. Horace rallies him gently, but his remonstrance ends in compliments on his simple life and philosophical tastes. We remember that in the Ode he is spoken of as having accumulated a philosophical library.

¹ A little town near the Pomptine marshes, dull and probably not very wholesome.

IF you are enjoying as you should, Iccius, the fruits which you gather of Agrippa's Sicilian estates, it is not possible that Jove himself could give you greater abundance. A truce to murmurings : for he is not poor who has the full use of property. If all is well with digestion, with lungs, with feet, the wealth of kings will not be able to give you more. If it so be that, denying yourself what all make free with, you live on nettle salad ; so will you continue to live though this moment a Pactolus-stream of fortune should drench you with gold ; be it because money has no secret of changing nature, or because you think everything else a trifle in comparison with virtue. We marvel at the story how Democritus¹ let his cattle eat bare his farm and standing crops while his soul, far away from the body, was on its swift travels ; and yet here are you, while the itch of gain spreads from palm to palm, keeping as in old days your great tastes and caring for high questions ; what causes set bounds to the sea, what makes the year warm or cold, whether stars wander through their courses of their own motion or by law, what shrouds the moon's disk in darkness, what brings it forth again, what are the purpose and effects of nature's harmony in discord², whether it be Empedocles that is doting, or the wit of Stertinus. But whether you have got to slaughtering fish or only leeks and onions¹, make a friend of Pompeius Grosphus, and if he asks anything of you, readily give it him: Grosphus will ask nothing but what is right and fair. Friends are always cheap in the market when good men have lack of something. But that you may not be ignorant how the world is going in Rome, the Cantabrian has fallen before the valour of Agrippa, the Armenian before that of Claudius Nero: Phraates, humbled to his knees, has submitted to Caesar's imperial rule: Golden Plenty from a full horn is pouring her fruits upon Italy.

¹ The Eleatic philosopher, a standing instance in Cicero of absorption in philosophical study.

² Phrases of the natural philosophy of Empedocles. For Stertinius see Sat. 2. 3. He represents here the Stoic physics.

XIII

Ut proficiscentem

To Vinus Asina.

Under the form of a letter supposed to be sent after the messenger who has just been dispatched to carry a copy of some poems (doubtless the three Books of Odes) to Augustus, Horace is making a playful apology to the Emperor for any untimeliness in the presentation. The play on the name of Asina which supplies so much of the imagery of the Epistle belongs to a form of wit which the Romans thought urbane. Who Vinus Asina was, and what his relations to Horace, is unknown.

AS I explained to you often and at length when you set out, Vinus, you will deliver my rolls with seal unbroken to Augustus, if he be well, if he be in good spirits, if, finally, he shall ask for them; lest in desire to help me you blunder and bring odium on my book by the officious service of excessive zeal. If perchance the parcel of my writings prove too heavy and gall your shoulders, fling it away at once, rather than dash down in ill temper the pack-saddle when you reach your destination, and turn your family name of Asina into a jest, and become the talk of the town. Over hillsides, streams, sloughs, you will put out your full strength. When once you have won your purpose, reached your goal, and laid down your burden, you will keep charge of it not so as to carry the parcel of parchments under your arm, as a rustic carries a lamb, as tipsy Pyrria¹ the hank of stolen wool, as the guest at a tribesmen's dinner his slippers and felt cap. Push steadily onwards, and remember my earnest request that you will not tell all the world what a heavy load you found the poems which are to occupy the eyes and ears of Caesar. So go your way; farewell; beware of stumbling and breaking the brittle goods entrusted to you.

¹ There is a play both (as in the 'nettle salad' above) on Iccius' vegetable diet, and (as in other places in Horace) on the supposed view of the Pythagoreans that souls in their transmigrations passed into animals and sometimes even vegetables.

XIV

Vilice silvarum

To his bailiff.

The 'Vilicus' was the slave-bailiff who, with eight slaves under him, took charge of Horace's country house and home farm. Under the form of a letter to him, contrasting their tastes, Horace sets forth his own love of country life and preaches against restlessness.

¹ A character, we are told, in a comedy.

BAILIFF of my woods and of the little farm which makes me myself again—which you despise, though it gives a home to five households and sends off to *Varia*¹ five worthy senators—let us try whether I am more strenuous in weeding the mind or you in weeding the land, and whether Horace or his property is in the better condition. For me, though I am kept in town awhile by Lamia's tender heart and his sorrow as he mourns his brother, grieves inconsolably for his lost brother, yet every impulse of my soul bears me to the place where you are, and loves to burst the barriers that close on its course. I call happy the man whose life is spent in the country, you the man whose life is spent in town. One who likes the lot of another of course dislikes his own. Each is a fool, unjustly laying the blame on the place, which does not deserve it: the true culprit is the mind, which never can run away from itself. When you were a common drudge, the country was the object of your secret prayers; now that you are bailiff you long for the town, its games and its baths. You know that I am consistent, and that it is with a heavy heart that I go away whenever the business which I hate draws me to Rome. Our ideals are not the same—there is the point of difference between us. What you hold to be desert and 'unharboured wilds' are hailed as lovely by one who feels with me; and he hates what you think beautiful.

¹ Now Vico Varo, the little town seven miles above Tivoli, where the Digentia (Licenza), the stream of Horace's valley, joins the Anio. 'Senators' is a playful exaggeration for the members of some communal council.

It is the arch and the savoury cookshop that send through you a thrill of longing for the town. I see it, and understand that 'that¹ nook at the world's end will grow pepper and spice as soon as it will grow grapes,' and that 'there is no tavern near that can supply you with wine, nor flute-player to whose music you can dance till the earth is tired,' and yet that 'you have to keep the fields busy which have been long since they felt the mattock, and to care for the ox after he is unyoked, and pull leaves to fill his belly, and when you would like a holiday the river finds you fresh work if there has been a rainfall, and it has to be taught by many a dam to spare the sunny meadow.'

Now come, hear what it is that prevents our singing the same tune. One whom fine-spun gowns became and shining curls, one whom you remember finding favour, though empty-handed, with greedy Cinara, whom you remember fond of drinking the clear Falernian before midday was past, now finds his pleasure in a simple meal and a sleep on the grass near the stream. Shame is not in having played, but in not knowing when to break off the play. In the place where you live, no one spoils the edge of my enjoyments with sidelong glances or poisons them with the tooth of secret hate. My neighbours smile to see me moving sods and stones. You would rather gnaw the tough rations of a city slave: that is the company into which your wishes bear you. The sharp-witted town slave envies you the free use of wood and flock and garden. The ox longs for the horse's trappings: the horse, when he is lazy, longs to be set ploughing. If they consult me, I shall advise each that he ply the trade he understands and be content.

¹ These seem to be meant as echoes of the bailiff's grumbling.

XV

Quae sit hiems Veliae

To Vala.

Horace, ordered by his physician to discontinue his yearly visit to Baiae, is looking for a watering-place, and doubting between Salernum (Salerno) and Velia, some fifty miles further down the coast. He writes to ask questions about them of Vala, who had a country house in the district. The last part of the Epistle is a humorous and ironical apology for the minuteness of his inquiries about the fare: 'You see I am like Maenius—a philosopher when I can't help it, but a "bon-vivant" when I can be.' Modern readers who have experience of the humours of a 'health-resort' will recognize the picture of the indignation felt at Baiae at the slighting of its sulphur baths.

WHAT the winter is at Velia, what the climate at Salernum, my Vala, what kind of folk live there and what the road is like—for you must know Antonius Musa's fiat pronounces Baiae useless to me, and yet makes Baiae look on me as an enemy when I drench myself in cold water through the cold of mid-winter—'really that their myrtle-groves should be abandoned, and the sulphur baths despised, so famous for driving the most obstinate rheumatism from the muscles'—so the town groans, and hates the silly invalids who are bold enough to place head and stomach under the springs of Clusium or to visit Gabii or the cold uplands. My quarters have to be changed and the horse driven past the well-known halting places. 'Where are you going? I am not for Cumae or Baiae,' so the rider will say with an angry tug at the left rein—the horse's ear, you know, is in his mouth, when the bit is in it)—which place is best supplied with corn, whether they drink rain-water from tanks or wells fed by perennial springs—the wines of that district I do not stop to ask of: in my country home I can put up with and submit to anything you like; but when I have come to the seaside I want something generous and mellow, which may drive away care, which may flow into my veins and into my heart with rich hope, which may find me speech, which may make me young again, and give me favour in the eyes of the kind ladies of Lucania)—which of the two neighbourhoods breeds more hares, which wild boars, the waters of which sea give more covert to fish and sea-urchins, that when I come home from thence I may be in good case and fit for Phaeacia—all these questions it is yours to answer, ours to give you full credence.

Maenius—when, after using up like a man of spirit all he inherited from mother and father, he set up as a city wit, a trencherman at every table, with no crib to call his own, a man who when he lacked a dinner knew no difference between citizen and foeman, ruthless in inventing scandal of any kind and against any person, a very whirlwind and whirlpool of desolation to the market—used to spend whatever he gained upon his insatiable appetite. This fellow, when he had got little or no spoil from those who encouraged or who feared his villainy, would make a supper large enough for three bears on plate after plate of some cheap tripe or lamb's flesh. To such a point had he changed his tone that (like Bestius in his reformed days) he would say that men who spent their substance on gluttony ought to have their bellies scored with white-hot iron. At the same time, if he ever took any larger booty, when he had reduced it to smoke and ashes 'I do not wonder, by Hercules,' he would say, 'at those who put their patrimony down their throats, since there really is nothing better than a fat fieldfare, nothing nobler than a broad sow's paunch.'

To tell truth, that is a picture of me. When means fail me, I sing the praises of the safe and the humble, and put a bold face on cheap fare : but at the same time if anything better and more savoury falls to my lot, I say that you, gentlemen, are the only philosophers, and alone have the secret of a happy life, whose wealth has, for all to see, solid foundation in well-appointed country houses.

XVI

Ne perconteris

To Quinctius.

Horace describes himself in Epist. 1. 1, as inclining now to Epicurean now to Stoic views. In the last Epistle he with some irony confessed to the former; in this one he is a more serious preacher of the latter. He touches in the course of it on many of the current Stoical doctrines and with little or none of the banter with which he usually treats them. The connexion between the description of his country home and the rest of the Epistle is not made quite clear. Perhaps that it is not is part of the easy inconsequence of a letter. But there is, no doubt, an unexpressed comparison between Horace's own life and the life of reality and simplicity which he holds up to Quinctius as the only happy one.

TO forestall all your questions about my farm, my good friend Quinctius, whether it finds its master bread from its own corn, or makes him rich in supply of olives or apples, or in meadow land, or in vine-clothed elms, you shall have the character and lie of the land described to you with an owner's garrulity. Think of a mass of hills, unbroken were they not divided by a well-timbered valley, so placed that the sun when he comes to us looks on its right side, as he leaves us in his flying car warms its left. The tempering of the air you would praise. What if you learned that the bushes grow generous store of cornels and plums, that oak and holm-oak gladden the cattle with abundant forage and their master with abundant shade? You would say that it was the greenery of Tarentum brought to your doors. A spring, too, fit to give its name to a river—Hebrus, as he encompasses Thrace, is not cooler or purer—flows with its medicine for sick heads and sick stomachs. This is the hiding-place, attractive to me, lovely even (if you trust my judgement) in itself, which keeps me for you safe and sound through September's season.

And now tell me of yourself—your life is all it should be, if you are taking the trouble to be all that we call you. We already have you on our lips, all we in Rome, as a happy man. I am only afraid of your taking the word of others rather than your own about yourself; or thinking that any but the wise and good can be happy ; or, if the world says often enough that you are in sound and good health, hiding a fever as the feast draws near, and pretending not to feel it, till the trembling falls on your hands already in the dish. It is a false shame which makes fools hide wounds instead of healing them. If one were to speak of wars fought by you on land and sea, and try to tickle your ears, when they could listen, with such words as these :

Which is most,
Thy people's health to thee, or thine to us,
Long may He keep a secret still unguessed,
Who guards both Rome and thee !

you would recognize that they came from a panegyric on Augustus¹. When you allow yourself to be called 'a wise man without a flaw,' are you answering, pray tell me, to your own name ? 'Yes, I feel pleasure, of course, as you do, in being called a good man and wise.' The power that gave you this title to-day will take it away, if so it pleases, to-morrow ; just as if it shall have bestowed the rods on an unworthy claimant, it will with the same authority take them away again : 'Put it down, I have not given it you,' it says. I put it down and retire, hanging my head. If the same people were to cry after me 'Thief!', take away my good name, accuse me of having strangled my father, ought I to feel the sting of such false charges, and go red and white ? Who is pleased with baseless honour, or frightened by untrue scandal, save the man who is still full of flaws and in need of the doctor? Who is your 'good man'? You answer 'one who observes the decrees of the senate, statutes, and laws: one who is set as arbitrator to decide quarrels many and grave: money is safe when he is the security, a cause when he is the witness.' Yet this very man all his household and all his neighbours see to be base within, beneath the fair-looking skin of respectability. If a slave were to say to me 'I never stole or ran away': 'You have your reward' I should answer: 'you are not flogged.' 'I never committed murder.' 'You shall not hang on a cross for the crows to eat.' 'I am a good and useful servant.' One of us Sabellians shakes his head and says 'no, no!' For even the wolf learns caution and fears the pitfall, the hawk the suspected snare, the pike the covered hook: men who are really good hate vice because they love virtue. You will not commit wrong because you dread punishment. Give you the hope of escaping detection, and you will put no difference between what is sacred and what is not. For when you filch only one bushel of beans from a thousand, that makes my loss less serious, not your offence. Your 'good man,' the paragon of the Forum and the law-court, whenever he offers a porker or a bullock to the gods, after saying aloud 'Father Janus,' and aloud 'Apollo,' moves his lips as though he dreaded that any should hear him: 'Fair Laverna¹, grant to me not to be found out: grant me to pass for just and conscientious: shroud in night my wrongdoing, in clouds my fraud!’

¹ They are actually lines, the Scholiasts tell us, from the 'Panegyric on Augustus' by the poet Varius.

¹ The goddess of thieves and impostors.

How the miser is better than a slave, or more free, when he stoops for the brass coin nailed to the ground¹ at a crossway, I do not see: for he who shall have desires will have fears too; and again he who shall live in fear will never, in my judgement, be a free man. One who is always in a hurry, always over head and ears in the amassing of wealth, has lost his shield, has run away from Virtue’s post. Since you can sell your captive², do not think of killing him: he will make a useful slave: he is tough—let him feed your cattle or guide your plough: send him to sea, and let him pass the winter in mid-seas as a trader: let him make corn cheaper, let him fetch and carry breadstuff and household goods.

The truly ‘wise man and good’ will venture to say, ‘Pentheus³, lord of Thebes, what will you compel me to bear and suffer that is unworthy of me?’ ‘I will take away your goods.’ ‘You mean my cattle, my substance, furniture, silver? You may take them all.’ ‘I will keep you in handcuffs and fetters and under stern gaolers.’ ‘God himself at any moment that I shall choose will set me free.' I imagine this is his meaning :

¹ Nailed, according to the Scholiast, by idle boys for the pleasure of watching to see who would stop first and try to pick it up.

² This is addressed to the supposed captor of this runaway from Virtue’s army. Divested of the figure, ‘such a man will not make a philosopher, a “good man”; he is fit for the menial and money-getting professions.’

³ The remainder of the Epistle is an adaptation of a scene in the Bacchantes of Euripides.

 'I will die'—Death is the limit that ends everything.

XVII

Quamvis, Scaeva, satis

To Scaeva.

The subject of the Epistle, like that of the following one, is the relations of patron and protégé. So far as regards the attitude of the patron this was treated in Epist. I. 7. In these Epistles it is treated from the other side. We do not know who Scaeva was nor what his connexion with Horace. The Epistle has an air of irony and of satire. Its natural effect is to suggest a class of aspirants, irresolute at first and half ashamed of being patronized, yet driven to it by greediness and the impetuosity of relatives, and in danger when they enter on it of turning out beggars and grumblers.

ON the difficult question how one should live with one's betters, although your own care for yourself and your knowledge suffice, Scaeva, yet listen to the advice of a humble friend who needs still himself much teaching. It is rather like a blind man offering himself as a guide; yet blind though we be, look and see whether we have anything to say which you may care to make your own.

If your delight be to take your ease and sleep till the sun is up, if the dust and the clatter of wheels and tavern noises distress you, I shall advise you to go off to Ferentinum: for joys are no monopoly of the rich; he has not had an unhappy life who from birth to death has lived out of the world's knowledge. If, on the other hand, you wish to be able to help your friends and to treat yourself more generously, you will find your way from your dry crust to the savoury dishes.

‘If Aristippus could dine contentedly on garden-stuff he would not care to live with princes,’ said one. ‘If my critic knew how to live with princes’ was the answer, ‘he would have a soul above garden-stuff.’

Tell me whose words and life of those two you approve ; or let me tell you, as you are the younger, why Aristippus’ view is the better. For this is the way, as the story goes, that he parried the thrust of the snappish Cynic : ‘ I play the parasite for my own pleasure, you for the people’s. My plan is the better and more honourable by far. I render my services that I may ride on horseback and be fed by my patron. What you ask is paltry, but you have to humble yourself to the giver, though you say that you want from none.’ Aristippus was at home in every phase of condition and circumstance, venturing to aim at a rise, ready to be content with his present level. On the other hand, I shall marvel if he who wears the doubled sackcloth of endurance proves to feel at home if his mode of life is changed. The first will not wait for a purple mantle ; he will put on what comes and walk through the most crowded streets, and will play not ungracefully the one part or the other. The second will shun a cloak from the looms of Miletus with more horror than a dog or snake¹, and will die of cold if you do not give him back his sackcloth. Give it him, and let him live out his silly life. To levy war and drag foemen in triumph before the eyes of your fellow citizens is a lot that touches the throne of Jove and essays the life of heaven. To have found favour with leaders of mankind is not the meanest of glories. It is not every one that can get to Corinth. Who feared to fall did not climb at all. Be it so—what of him who has climbed where he would? Has he done as a man ought? But in this, if in anything, lies what we are aiming at. One dreads the burden as too heavy for a small soul and a small body. Another lifts it on his shoulders and carries it home. If manhood is not a name and no more, it is one who tries like a man that is taking the right road to glory and reward.

¹ A proverbial expression. They were of ill omen to meet ; see Od. 3. 27, p. 107.

Who in their lord's presence say nothing of their need will get more than one who asks. There is a difference between taking modestly and trying to snatch. But this¹ was the fountain-head of the business. 'My sister has no dower, my poor mother is a beggar, and my farm is neither saleable nor able to keep us.' Who speaks so, calls aloud 'give us food.' A second chimes in with 'for me too.' So the gift will be divided and a quarter broken off for him. But if the raven could eat in quiet he would have a better meal and much less wrangling and envy.

The man who, when taken as a travelling-companion to Brundisium or lovely Surrentum, grumbles that the road is rough or the cold and rain disagreeable, or that his box has been broken open and its contents plundered, recalls the familiar tricks of a mistress who weeps now for a pet dog, now for an anklet she has had stolen, so that presently her real losses and sorrows are not believed. The man who has once been fooled does not care to lift up a beggar with a broken leg in the streets, though he shed ever so many tears, and swear by holy Osiris, or say 'Believe me, I am not cheating you—cruel men, lift up the lame.' 'You must look for a stranger' the neighbours shout back at him till they are hoarse.

¹ i. e. getting more.

XVIII Si bene te novi

To Lollius.

The general subject is the same as that of the last Epistle, but the tone is different. The person addressed is a man of birth and self-respect, and the position contemplated is not that of a mere parasite or protégé, but of some one attached to a man in a public sphere, and likely to be entrusted with important secrets. It recalls such a post as that which was offered to Horace himself and refused by him—that of private secretary to the Emperor. Lollius (a young man of birth and promise, to whom Epist. 1. 2 was addressed) may be supposed to have been offered such a relation to some one high in the political world. Horace, with a certain degree of playful exaggeration, sets out for him the difficulties which it involves, with a conclusion which means either 'decline it, as I did a similar offer,' or at least 'escape from it as soon as you can into a more dignified, free, and simple life.'

IF I know you well, my Lollius, frankest of men¹, you will shrink from wearing the guise of the parasite when you have professed the friend. As the matron will differ in look as well as character from the mistress, so the loyal friend will stand quite clear of the faithless parasite. There is a vice the opposite of this vice—it may be, a greater one—namely rudeness, which marks the clown, and is awkward and disagreeable, which commends itself by a skin like a stubble-field, and discoloured teeth, in the desire to pass for simple frankness and for Virtue's self. True Virtue is the mean between vices, as far from one extreme as from the other. The one man, grovelling in the excess of servility, a jester of the lowest couch¹, so shivers at the nod of the man of wealth, so echoes his utterances, and gathers up his words as they fall, that you would think a schoolboy was repeating his lessons to an ill-tempered master, or a mime actor playing a second part. The other man quarrels often about goatswool², dons his armour to fight about trifles—‘to think indeed that I am not believed soonest, or that I must be muzzled from saying outright what I really feel! A second life were a poor compensation.’ What think you is the question at issue? Whether Castor or Dolichos has most science, or whether the road of Minucius or of Appius is the best way to Brundisium!

¹ Horace's fear for him is evidently not that he will be too subservient, but too independent for a post which demands considerable self-suppression.

A follower stripped bare by the extravagance of women or the chances of the gaming table, one whom vainglory clothes and perfumes beyond his means, who is possessed by an insatiable hunger and thirst for money, by a shamefaced dread of poverty, his wealthy friend, though by ten vices the more accomplished, hates and shudders at; or if he does not hate him, schools, and like a fond mother would have him wiser than himself and his better in virtue; and says to him (what is about the truth) 'My wealth—do not try to rival me—allows of folly: your means are paltry. A close-fitting gown besseems a companion of sound sense: cease to match yourself against me.' Eutrapelus, when he wished to injure some one, made him a present of some costly clothes: 'for (said he) the proud and happy man will at once with his smart tunics take to him new plans and hopes, will lie in bed till daylight, will postpone honest business to a mistress's whims, will make the fortune of money-lenders; to end the story, will become a gladiator or the hired driver of a market gardener's nag.'

¹ i.e. a henchman of the host; such as Nomentanus and Porcius in Sat. 2. 8 (p. 257).

² A proverbial expression for a subject not worth argument.

As you will never pry into his secrets, so if he trusts you with one, you will keep it, even if put to the question by wine or anger. Again, as you will neither praise your own pursuits nor find fault with those of every one else, so you will not be composing verses when he is wishing to go hunting. This is the way that a gulf opened in the friendship of the twin brothers Amphion and Zethus, till the lyre was hushed on which the sterner frowned. Amphion, we are given to believe, yielded to the temper of a brother. Do you yield to the commands, so gently laid, of a powerful friend; and when he takes out into the country his train of mules laden with the nets of Aetolia, and his dogs, rise and cast aside the moroseness of the unsocial Muse, that you may share the toil which earns the relish even as you share the supper—'tis the wonted pursuit of Rome's heroes, good for name as well as for life and limb—the more since you are in sound health and can beat even the hound in swiftness and the boar in strength. Add that there is none who handles more gracefully manly weapons : you know amid what shouting of the ring you maintain the fights of the Campus. Lastly, you saw hard service in the Cantabrian campaigns under the captain who is even now taking down the standards from Parthian temples and, if aught is still wanting, is adjudging it to the arms of Italy.

Once more, that you may not hang back and absent yourself when you are not likely to be excused, remember that, with all your care to do nothing that is not strictly in time and tune, you sometimes play the trifler on your father's estate: the warriors divide the pleasure-boats; you captain one side, and the fight of Actium is represented by your slaves in true foemen's style; your rival is your brother, your pond is the Adriatic; till victory crowns with bays the one or the other combatant. One who believes that you feel with his interests will further and back with both thumbs¹ your own sport.

To pursue my lecture, if lecturing to you is not impertinent—look many times what you say, and of whom, and to whom you say it. Fly from a questioner; he is sure to be a babbler also. Open ears never keep faithfully the secrets whispered to them; and meanwhile a word once let out of the cage cannot be whistled back. Never set your heart on a slave within the marble threshold of friendship's temple; lest the master make you happy for ever with a valueless present or miserable by a churlish refusal.

¹ A phrase from the usage of spectators in the amphitheatre.

What sort of man you commend to him, look to it again and again, lest presently another's misdoings strike a pang of shame into yourself. We make mistakes, and sometimes introduce one who does not deserve it. If then you have been taken in, give up defending one who must bear the burden of faults that belong to him, in order that if charges assail one whom you know thoroughly, you may stand by him and protect him when he trusts your championship. For when Theon's tooth¹ is nibbling round him, you surely feel that the danger will come a little later to yourself. It is your own interest that is at stake when your next neighbour's wall is ablaze. Neglect a fire and it gathers strength.

Making up to a powerful friend seems a pleasant thing to those who have not tried: who has tried will dread it. For yourself, my friend, while your bark is on the sea, give all heed lest the breeze shift and turn your course back again. The gloomy hate the cheerful, the mirthful the gloomy, the hasty the man of calm, the indolent the man of action: drinkers, [who swill Falernian past midnight, hate]² the man who refuses the proffered winecup, however much you swear that it makes you feverish o' nights. Take the cloud from your brow : the rule of the world is that the shy is taken for deep, the silent for sour.

¹ A proverbial expression, the sense of which is evident, but the origin unknown.

² A line of doubtful reading.

Through all this you will read the books, and cross-question the persons, that can tell you what is the way to pass through life smoothly—whether Desire, a beggar always, is to drive and harass you ; whether the fear and hope of things useful only in the second degree ; whether virtue is the prize of learning or the gift of nature ; what lessens care, what makes you a friend to yourself, what gives unbroken calm—office, or the charms of gain, or a quiet journey in the untrodden paths of life. For me, as often as Digentia gives me new life, the icy stream of which Mandela drinks, that village all wrinkles from the cold—what do you suppose I feel ? what think you, my friend, I pray for ? Give me what I have, or even less ; and therewith let me live to myself for what remains of life, if the gods will that anything remain. Let me have a generous supply of books and of food stored a year ahead ; nor let me hang and tremble on the hope of the uncertain hour. Nay, it is enough to ask Jove, who gives them and takes them away, that he grant life and subsistence ; a balanced mind I will find for myself.

XIX

Prisco si credis

To Maecenas.

Imitation, false and true.

Horace has been criticized as an imitator. His answer is to contrast slavish, inartistic, second-hand imitation, of which he has himself been the object, imitation of manners, garb, peculiarities, faults, with the free imitation of great models, which the greatest Greeks had themselves practised.

In the later part of the Epistle he defends himself more generally against detraction, tracing it to his unwillingness to adopt vulgar arts of self-advertisement.

YOU know, Maecenas, as well as I, that, if you trust old Cratinus, no poems can please long, nor live, which are written by water-drinkers. Ever since Liber enlisted poets, as half crazed, among his Satyrs and Fauns, the sweet Muses have usually had a scent of wine about them in the forenoon. Homer by his praises of wine is convicted as a wine-bibber. Even father Ennius never sprang forth to tell of arms but when he had well drunk. The Forum and the well-cover of Libo¹ I shall award to the sober, song I shall deny to the staid. From the moment that I issued this judgement, poets have never ceased to drink against one another by night and to reek of wine by day. What, if a man tried to imitate Cato by the fierceness of a grim look, by bare feet and the cut of a narrow gown, would he in this way restore to our eyes Cato's virtuous life? The countryman of Iarbas burst himself through emulating the tongue of Timagenes², in his zealous efforts to be held a wit and a man of eloquence. Models lead us astray of which the faults are the things easy to imitate. If it so chanced that I had a pale skin, they would drink the bloodless cummin. O imitators, you slavish herd! How often have your false alarms stirred my wrath, how often my mirth! I have planted free steps on unoccupied ground where none was before me, not trodden in the footsteps of other men. Who trusts himself will be king and leader of the swarm. I was the first to hold up to Latin eyes iambics of Paros¹, following the rhythms and the spirit of Archilochus, not the matter, or the language with which he hunted down Lycambes.

¹ It is doubtful whether this is named as near the law-courts or the place of business.

² Timagenes was a witty rhetorician of the day. 'The countryman of Iarbas' (lit. 'son of Iarbas') should mean 'Numidian' (Iarbas is the name of a Numidian king mentioned by Livy, and Virgil took the name for Dido's Numidian suitor); but the story here referred to is unknown.

And lest you should be disposed to decorate me with a humbler garland for fearing to change the measure and poetic form, bethink you that Sappho, no weak woman, tempers her Muse with the rhythm of Archilochus; Alcaeus tempers his; though he differs much in matter and arrangement, nor chooses a father-in-law to befoul with venomous verse, nor twists a halter for his betrothed by libellous song. He is the model, not so much as named by other tongue, whom I, the lyrist of Latium, have made known abroad: my pride is in bringing things untold before to be read by gentle eyes and held in gentle hands.

Would you know why ungrateful readers praise and love me at home, disparage me unkindly abroad! I am not the man to hunt the suffrages of the windy crowd at the cost of suppers and by the gift of worn raiment.

¹ The island from which Archilochus came.

I am not the man, after listening to writers of name and giving them as good again, to stoop to canvass the lecture-desks of schoolmasters¹. 'Thence the tears, you see².' If I have said 'I am ashamed to read aloud writings unworthy of crowded theatres and to add weight to trifles,' 'You are laughing at us' one answers, 'and keeping them for Jove's ears. Beautiful in your own eyes, you believe that you, and you only, drop the true honey of poetry.' Meet this with open sneer I dare not; and lest I smart under his sharpened nail if I close with him, 'The place you offer mislikes me' I cry, and claim an adjournment of the sports: for sport sometimes breeds eager and angry rivalry, anger fierce enmities and war with its horrors.

XX

Vertumnum Ianumque

To his own book.

An epilogue. Under the form of a playful deprecation of publicity he anticipates the fame which his book is to attain and the interest which the world will take in all that relates to its author. To appreciate the real meaning the Epistle should be compared with the Odes which have a similar purpose, 2. 20 and 3. 30.

The book is addressed as if it were a spoilt home-born slave who is desiring to escape from his master's house into the great world.

YOU are looking wistfully, it seems, my book, at Vertumnus and Janus³, bent (save the mark !)

¹ The schoolmasters (grammatici) taught and criticized poetry, and so could make or mar the fortune of a young poet.

² A quotation from Terence which had passed into a proverb.

³ These stand for the booksellers' quarters in Rome.

on being set for sale, neatly smoothed with the pumice of the brothers Sosii¹. You hate the keys and seals which the modest are so fond of; you grumble at being shown to few, and praise publicity, though I did not breed you thus. Well—off to the town, whither you are so anxious to go. When you are once out of the cage there will be no returning. ‘Woe is me! What have I done? What was it I wished?’ you will say when something has hurt you, and you are conscious that you are being rolled up small, when he who has fancied you has had enough and is tired. But if he who is forecasting your future has not lost his craft in vexation at your folly, you will be well loved at Rome till your prime is past: when you have begun to show the thumb-marks of the vulgar, you will either be left in silence to be the food of bookworms, or will run away to Utica, or be sent in bonds to Ilerda². Then the monitor to whom you would not listen will only laugh at you, like the man who in anger thrust his obstinate ass against the rocks³. Who would take trouble to save one who will not be saved? This also is in the future: second childhood shall overtake you when you are set to give reading lessons to schoolboys in the outskirts of the town.

When the cooler sun brings you a larger audience you shall tell them of me; how born of a freedman

¹ Booksellers of the time. The pumice was used to smooth the edges of the papyrus when rolled up tightly.

² Utica in Africa, Ilerda in Spain. ‘You will be exported for the provincial book-markets.’ But the figures, ‘run away’ &c., are of a slave.

³ One of many fables only known from an allusion in Horace.

sire and in a modest home I spread wings too wide for my nest (so all that you take from my birth you will add to my merit); how I found favour, both in the field and at home, in the eyes of the first man of Rome; of small stature, early grey, made by nature for the sunshine, quick to be angry, but as quick to be appeased. If by chance any one asks you of my age, let him know that I completed my forty-fourth December in the year when Lollius received Lepidus as a colleague¹.

¹ i. e. in B. C. 21. 'December,' because Horace's birthday was on Dec. 8.

BOOK II

I

Cum tot sustineasTo Augustus.

Augustus had expressed a strong desire that Horace should address an Epistle to him, and with tact and judgement Horace selects as its subject a defence of the poetry of the Augustan age as against the school of critics who decried it in comparison with the poetry of the Republic, for which they professed an indiscriminate admiration. The main points of the Epistle are :

1. That it is absurd to judge poetry by its age, not by its intrinsic merits. The arguments put into the opponent's mouth are intended to make his case ridiculous.
2. That the conditions under which Roman poetry had been developed, its rustic origin, the lack of generally diffused taste, and of the artistic temperament of which Greece gave such an example, had made it certain that perfection could only come late.
3. That Augustus' literary judgement was a true one—that in Virgil and Varius and (it is hinted, not said) in Horace he has patronized poets who have the true stamp of Classics and whose works will live, in a sense in which those of the earlier poets will not.

WHILE you have on your shoulders alone the burden of so many and such weighty charges, guarding the Roman world in arms, furnishing it with fair manners and faultless laws, it would be a sin against the public weal if I were to waste your precious time, Caesar, with long talk. Romulus and father Liber, and Pollux with his twin Castor, who when their mighty tasks were done found place among the temples of Gods, so long as they were making fruitful the earth and civilizing mankind, laying to rest fierce wars, assigning lands, founding cities, made grievous complaint that the public favour they had looked for did not answer to their deserts. He who crushed the dire Hydra and with predestined toil subdued the monsters which story tells of, found that Envy is a monster to be tamed by the end and by nothing before it. One who is a dead weight on excellence below his own scorches by his very brilliance, yet, when his light is quenched, he too will be loved. In your case, while you are still among us we shower honours upon you betimes, and set up altars to swear by in your name, and confess that nought like you will arise hereafter or has arisen at any time before.

But yet this same people of yours, wise and just as it is in setting you, you only, before our own captains and those of Greece, weighs other things on a wholly different principle and method; and has distaste and hatred for all but what it sees to have vanished from earth and to have had its day. Such a partisan is it of antiquity that the Tables which the Ten enacted to forbid wrongdoing, treaties of right made by the kings with Gabii or the stern old Sabines, the volumes of the Pontiffs, ancient scrolls of poet-seers, it loves to speak of as though they had come from the lips of the Muses on the Alban hill.

If you argue that, because among Greek writings the oldest are actually the best, Roman writers must be weighed in the same balance, the conclusion needs no words. On that principle the olive has nothing hard inside, or the nut has nothing hard outside¹. We have come to fortune's zenith—we paint and play the cithern, and wrestle with more skill than the Greeks in their palaestra.

If you say that poetry is like wine which improves by keeping, then I must ask you to tell me what the year is that gives writings their claim to a higher price. A writer who died a hundred years ago, should he be reckoned among the perfect and ancient, or among the worthless and new? Name a limit, to bar future quarrels. 'He is old' you say, 'and excellent, who completes a hundred years.' What then of one who has been dead less than that by a single month or year—amongst which is he to be reckoned, the ancient poets, or those whom the present and all succeeding ages must hold in contempt? 'He certainly shall find place of honour among the ancients whose age is less by such a short space as a month or even a whole year.' I make the most of what you grant me; and like single hairs of the horse's tail, little by little I pull away one and then another, till, by the trick of the heap that slips from under him², I have landed on the ground my friend who goes back to dates, and measures merit by years, and admires nothing but what the Funeral Goddess has consecrated.

Ennius the 'wise,' the 'gallant,' the 'second Homer' (so these judges of literature name him), heeds little, I take it, what has become of his big talk and dreams after Pythagoras¹. Is not even Naevius in all hands and remembered as though he wrote yesterday? So sacred a thing is any ancient poem. When the question is debated which has the advantage of the other, Pacuvius is awarded the fame of the 'learned,' Accius of the 'lofty' poet of the old school. The 'gown' of Afranius, such is the cant phrase, 'was of the very cut of Menander.' The 'quickness' of Plautus was 'after the pattern of Epicharmus of Sicily': Caecilius takes the prize for 'dignity,' Terence for 'art.' These are they whom this mighty Rome of ours learns by heart, these she crowds the packed theatres to gaze at, these she holds as the full list of poets from the days of Livius the writer to our own.

¹ i.e. you are forgetting that as all fruits are not made on one model, so national gifts are not all of one type.

² The reference is to the famous logical puzzle—'how many grains are necessary to make a heap? A thousand? nine hundred and ninety nine?' and so on till the heap is gone.

At times the world sees straight: there are occasions when it goes wrong. If it admires the ancient poets and praises them in such a sense as to put nothing before them, nothing on a level, it is in error. If it holds that some of their utterances are out of date, a large number harsh, if it confesses that many are careless, it has some taste and takes my side and Jove smiles on its judgement. I certainly make no assault upon the poems of Livius, nor desire that what I remember learning as a child under the rod of Orbilius should be blotted out of existence : but that they should be held faultless, models of beauty, and next door to perfection, I marvel. The truth is that if in them a chance phrase of grace lightens the darkness, if one verse and another are a little more neatly turned than the rest, they are unfairly made a specimen and set the value of the poem.

¹ Ennius is said to have dreamed that by a transmigration of souls such as Pythagoras taught, the soul of Homer had become again incarnate in him. Horace says he may let the dream go—these good critics vouch for it that he is a second Homer. All through the passage Horace is laughing at the cant phrases of the critics of the day who cried up the ancients in order to lower the more modern writers.

I feel how unjust it is that anything should be criticized not because its composition is thought coarse or out of taste but because it is modern, and that men should claim for ancient writings not indulgence but honour and all the prizes. If I were to express a doubt whether or not a play of Atta keeps its footing over the saffron-essence and flowers¹, nearly every father of a family would cry out that I must have lost all shame if I ventured to criticize what 'grave' Aesopus and 'learned' Roscius used to act. Either they think nothing can be right but what has pleased themselves, or else they think it shame to be led by their youngers, and to confess in their old age that what they learned before their beard grew is poor stuff.

The truth is, the man who praises Numa's Salian hymn and professes to understand as no one else does what he is just as much in the dark about as I am is not backing and applauding the genius of men who are dead and gone : he is really making war on our own age : it is jealousy and hatred of ourselves and all that belongs to us.

¹ i. e. the stage, which was sprinkled with these.

Now if novelty had been viewed as grudgingly by the Greeks as it is by us, what in these times would be ancient? Where would be that variety which the world now has to read and thumb each according to his taste? As soon as her wars were over Greece began to find time for trifling¹, and, while fortune smiled, to slide down the slope towards folly: she was all fire now for athletes and their pursuits, now for horse-racing: she was in love with workers either in marble or ivory or bronze: she let her eyes and soul hang intent on the painter's panel: she delighted now in flute-players, now in actors of tragedy. Like a little girl at play in the nursery, what she sought eagerly she soon tired of and let be. What likes and dislikes are there that you cannot believe to be easily changed? This was what her happy times of peace and prosperity brought.

At Rome for many generations it was men's pleasure, as it was their unbroken habit, to be up betimes with houses open, to deal law to clients, to open the cash-box when suitable names were the security, to learn from elders and teach youngers by what courses an estate might be increased, light desires—so ruinous to the pocket²—diminished. The fickle populace has changed its taste, and nowadays is fevered with a universal passion for writing. Boys and grave fathers alike sit at supper with their brows crowned with leaves and have an amanuensis to take down their poetry. Even I myself, who declare that I write no verses, turn out a greater liar than the Parthians, and am awake before sunrise, calling for pen and paper and portfolio. A man who knows nothing of a ship does not dare to handle one. No one ventures to prescribe southernwood for the sick unless he has learnt the use of drugs. Doctors undertake what belongs to doctors: carpenters handle carpenters' tools. Poetry we all write, those who have learnt and those who have not, without distinction.

¹ Horace does not really think art and literature 'trifling' or 'folly.' He is speaking as a Roman might, who undervalued the Greek artistic temperament in comparison with the practical and imperial gifts of Rome.

² Notice the ironical suggestion of the connexion in Roman minds between morality and thrift.

It is a mistake, and even a mild form of madness: yet it has its virtues—how great they are, let us reckon. A poet's heart is not easily given to avarice. He loves verses; they are his one interest. Money losses, runaway slaves, fires—he laughs at them all. He does not lay plans to cheat his partner or the boy who is his ward. His fare is pulse and coarse bread. Though he be no hero in the field, he is of use to the commonwealth, if you grant this, that even small things help great ends. It is the poet that gives form to the child's utterance while it is still tender and lisping. He gives the ear a bias from the first against coarse ways of speaking. Presently he moulds the heart also with kindly teaching, correcting roughness and envy and anger. He tells the story of right deeds, with famous examples equips the dawning age, and gives solace to the helpless and sore of heart. Whence should the virgin band of girls and boys learn their prayers, if the Muse had not found them the poet? Their chorus asks for aid of deities and feels their presence, cries for water from heaven, and wins its wish by the prayer which the poet has taught, averts pestilence, drives far the perils that are to be feared, gains both peace and a year rich in fruits. It is song that makes favour both with the gods above and the good powers below.

The farmers of old days, with their stout hearts and simple wealth, when after harvesting their corn they were giving a holiday to body and to spirit too, which had endured hardness for the hope of the end, together with the partners of their toil, their lads and faithful wife, would worship Earth with a porker, Silvanus with milk, with flowers and wine the Genius who forgets not the shortness of life. The Fescennine licence, which owed its origin to this custom, flung to and fro rustic ribaldry in metrical dialogue; and the freedom, welcomed for old usage once in the year, was amiable in its play, till jest, turned earnest, became a vent for angry feelings, and began unrestrainedly to threaten one honest house after another. Men assailed with a tooth that drew blood felt the sting. Even those who were unhurt were concerned for a risk which touched all. It went so far that a law was enacted with a penalty to forbid libellous verses. So they changed their strain, brought back by fear of the cudgel to a civil tongue and to the aim of pleasing.

When Greece had been enslaved she made a slave of her rough conqueror, and introduced the arts into Latium, still rude. This was how that uncouth Saturnian measure ran its stream dry, and refinement drove out the offensive rankness. Yet for long ages there remained, and there still remain, traces of the farmyard. For time had run on ere the Roman brought his wit to bear on Greek writings ; and, in the quiet that followed the Punic wars, began to ask whether Sophocles and Thespis and Aeschylus had anything to offer that was of use. Presently he made the essay whether he could worthily translate them, and satisfied himself, headstrong and eager as nature had made him ; for he has something of the breath of tragedy and makes happy hits, but is foolishly ashamed and afraid of blotting out what he writes.

It is commonly thought that, because Comedy finds its subjects in common life, it involves less labour, but really the burden is greater as the allowance to be given is less. See how Plautus fills the part of the young lover, of the strict father, of the plotting pander ; how well in his parasites he reproduces the stage glutton of farce, with what a slipshod sock¹ he runs across the stage. He is always in a hurry to pocket the money : when that is done, he recks little whether his play fall or stand firm on its legs.

The writer who is brought to the stage by Glory in her windy car² is put out of heart by a dull spectator, filled with pride by an attentive one : so light, so small is what breaks down or builds again the soul which is greedy of praise. Farewell for me to the stage and its concerns if the refusal of a palm-branch is to send me home pining, the granting of it in good flesh.

¹ The special shoe worn in comedy.

‘If Jonson’s learned sock be on.’—Milton.

² The comic poet who takes to the drama from desire for fame, and therefore thinks too much of the audience, as the other thought too little of it.

Another thing that often routs and terrifies even the venturesome poet, is that part of the audience, the stronger in numbers, though the weaker in merit and in rank, unlearned and stupid and ready to fight it out if the knights differ from them, in the middle of a play calls for either a bear or a boxing match. These are the things in which the rabble delights. But even with the knights all pleasure now has migrated from the ear to the empty delight of the restless eye. For four hours or more the curtain is kept down¹ whilst squadrons of horse and bodies of foot are seen flying: presently there passes the spectacle of unfortunate kings dragged with hands behind their backs: chariots of every shape and kind hurry along and ships; spoil of ivory is borne by, spoil of Corinthian brass. If he were on earth, Democritus would laugh at the sight, whether it were a half-panther-half-camel, or a white elephant, that made all faces turn one way. He would think the people a show to be studied more carefully even than the games, as giving him very much the more to look at. But for the poets—he would think them to be telling their tales to a deaf ass². For what voices have been of force enough to overcome the din with which our theatres ring? You would suppose it was the Garganian forest roaring or the Tuscan sea: such the shouts with which the games are viewed, and the works of art and knick-knacks of foreign wealth with which the actor bedizens himself. As soon as he steps on the stage right hands clash with left. 'Has he said anything?' Not one word. 'What then pleases them so?' That woollen stuff whose Tarentine dye is such a good imitation of the violet.

¹ The curtain was drawn up at the end of the performance, not let down as with us.

² A proverb for wasted labour.

And now that you may not by chance suppose that I am stinting praise when others handle well tasks which I refuse to attempt myself, let me say at once that it seems to me a feat like that of one who walks a tight rope, when the poet gives my heart anguish about nothing¹, awakes its passions, soothes it again, when like a magician he fills me with imagined terrors, and places me one moment at Thebes, another at Athens.

But come, you must include in your care those of us² who prefer to appeal to a reader rather than face the caprices of an unfeeling audience, if you mean to fill with volumes that gift³, so worthy of him, which you dedicated to Apollo, and to spur poets to make with greater zeal for green Helicon.

We poets, it is true, (that I may apply the pruning-hook to my own vineyard) often do harm to our own cause—when we offer a book to you when you are anxious or tired; when we are injured if a friend has ventured to criticize a single verse; when uninvited we turn again to passages which we have already read; when we lament that there is nothing to show for our toil and for the poems spun of such delicate thread; when we hope that the result will be that, so soon as you have learnt that we compose verses, you will at once send for us just as we wish, and bid us never want, and press us to go on writing.

¹ 'What's Hecuba to him or he to Hecuba?'

² i. e. other poets besides those of drama.

³ The Palatine^a Library founded by Augustus in the temple of Apollo on the Palatine hill.

Yet it is worth while at some trouble to see what keepers of the shrine are found for valour proved in the field and at home; for it may not be entrusted to an unworthy poet. The great king Alexander made a favourite of the miserable Choerilus, who as the reward of uncouth and ill-bred verses received philips¹ from the king's own mint. But just as if you handle black dyes they leave mark and stain, so writers too often daub over bright deeds with ugly verses. That same famous king who in his lavishness paid such a high price for such ridiculous poems, issued an ordinance that no one but Lysippus should mould the bronze to copy the features of the brave Alexander. Yet if you called that judgement, so fine in view of works of art, to books and what the Muses have to give, you would swear that he was born in the heavy air of Boeotia.

But Virgil and Varius, those true poets of your choice, discredit neither your judgement of them nor the many gifts which, to the great glory of the giver, they have received from you. And features copied in bronze do not show more clearly than the manners and souls of heroes of renown in the poet's work.

¹ The name of a coin; as a 'louis' or 'napoleon.'

In my case too, I should not prefer my 'talks' that crawl along the ground to making great exploits my theme, and telling how lands lie, and streams, and forts on mountain ledges, and barbaric realms, and wars ended under thy auspices throughout the world, and doors shut on Janus, the guardian of peace, and Rome a terror to the Parthians while thou art prince—if only my power were as my desire. But as thy greatness admits of no mean song, so my modesty dares not attempt a task which my strength refuses to bear. But the folly of officious affection never shows itself more clearly than when the art with which it would win favour is that of verse. For men learn more quickly and remember more readily what they laugh at than what they approve and look up to. I do not care for an attention which annoys me, and as I do not wish to have a waxen mask hung up for view anywhere which makes me uglier than I am, so I do not wish to be complimented in badly written verses, lest I be made to blush by the clumsy gift and find myself stretched out at length with my poet in a closed chest and carried off to the street where frankincense and perfumes are sold, and pepper and everything else that is wrapped in scribblers' sheets.

II

Flore, bono claroque

To Florus.

Horace's reasons for refusing to write more lyrics.

The theme is the same as that of Epist. 1. 1, but it is handled more fully. This means, no doubt, that there is a more serious purpose in view.

Florus (see Epist. i. 3) was one of the literary men of the new generation in the intimacy of the future Emperor Tiberius (the 'Claudius' of that Epistle and 'Nero' of this one). Either as the mouthpiece of his own circle, or more probably in the interests of the young prince, he has been putting pressure on the poet to do what a few years later, and with a similar purpose, he actually did—to resume his lyric writing. The reasons given for his refusal are playful and ironical, and come to little more than 'I am not in the mood,' but they give opportunity for at least two interesting passages, the satirical picture of 'mutual admiration' cliques in Roman literary society, and the glowing description (in which he seems to be portraying his friend, whether recently dead or still alive, the poet Virgil) of the poet who takes his art seriously.

The later part of the Epistle has also its personal purpose. When it is read with the earlier Epistle to Florus, it seems clear that Horace is pressing on his young friend the prescriptions in which he has himself found health of mind.

F AITHFUL friend to Nero good and great, my Florus, suppose some one should be wishing to sell you a slave bred on an estate at Tibur or Gabii, and should deal thus with you: 'This lad is clear-skinned and well-formed from head to foot; he shall be yours to have and to hold for eight thousand sesterces, money down, a home-bred slave, apt for service at his master's beck, with a smattering of Greek learning, fit for any employment—the clay is still moist; you may mould it to any shape. Moreover he will sing, not indeed as an artist, but so as to give pleasure over your wine. Many promises lessen credit, when one who wishes to thrust off his wares praises them beyond truth. I am under no pressure; of modest means, but what I have is my own. None of the slave-dealers would make you such an offer. It is not every one who would easily get such an offer from me. He had a lazy fit once, and hid himself, as boys will, in fear no doubt of the lash that hangs on the staircase. Pay your money, unless you find a difficulty in the escapade of which I have duly warned you': he would be on the right side of the law, I trow, in taking his price. The goods are damaged, but you bought them with your eyes open: the conditions of sale were told you. Do you yet pursue him with a frivolous and vexatious suit?

I told you when you started that I was lazy—for such attentions, as a man without a hand—lest you should presently be angry and scold that your letters received no answer from me. What good did I do, if you yet assail me when the law is on my side?

You complain of this besides, that I have broken my promise and send you none of the lyrics that you look for.

A soldier of Lucullus one night, when he was tired out and fast asleep, was robbed of all his hard-won earnings to the last as. It was after this that, while he was a very wolf in his fury, angry no less with himself than with the foe, his teeth keen set with hunger, he dislodged one of the king's¹ garrisons (so the story goes) from a position strongly fortified and rich in treasure. He gained glory by this exploit, and was decorated with gifts of honour, and received besides ten thousand sesterces in hard money. It so chanced that a little later the commander, when he was wishing to take some fort, tried to urge our friend with words which could have given inclination even to a coward: 'Go, my good man, whither valour calls you. Go—and fortune go with you—to receive the rich reward of your deserts. Why do you stand still?' At this the man, who was a shrewd fellow for all that he was a countryman, made answer: 'Go—say you? Aye, he will go, go whithersoever you wish, who has lost his purse.'

¹ i. e. Mithridates.

At Rome 'twas my good fortune to be bred, and taught how much Achilles' wrath harmed the Greeks. Kindly Athens added a little further accomplishment, namely to give me the desire to learn the difference between the straight and the crooked, and seek for truth in the garden of Academus¹. But the stress of the time drove me from my pleasant place; and the tide of politics bore me, a tyro in war, into arms that were to be no match for the thews of Caesar Augustus. From thence as soon as Philippi gave me my discharge, humbled, with my wings clipped, and robbed of the home and estate which I had inherited, poverty found me courage and drove me to compose verses. But now that I have what forbids want, what dose of hemlock will be sufficient to clear my brain, if I do not think it better to sleep o' nights than to write verses?

¹ The point is that philosophy was his first love, poetry only an episode in his life, and due to his want of money. We are not to take him too seriously.

Years as they pass plunder us of one thing after another. They have snatched from me mirth, love, banquets, play. They are on the way to wrench poetry from my grasp. What would you have me do?

Once more, people do not all admire and like the same things. Your pleasure is lyric poetry. My friend yonder delights in iambs¹, another in 'talks'² in Bion's satiric vein and with a spice of malignity. It seems to me like three guests at a banquet all at odds, asking, from their various taste, each for a different dish. What am I to give? What not? You refuse what the next desires. What you ask for, that, you see, is sour and distasteful to the two others.

Beyond all other reasons, do you think I can possibly write poetry at Rome amid all my cares and toils? One summons me to give security for him; another to leave all my duties and listen to his writings. One is ill in bed on Quirinus' Hill, another on the further side of the Aventine. Both must be visited. The distances, as you see, are nicely convenient. Perhaps you think the streets are clear and there is no difficulty in composing as I go. You meet a contractor hurrying in hot haste with his mules and porters: a huge machine is hoisting now a block of stone, now a beam. Funerals with their mourners are encountering wagons of solid timber. This way flies a mad dog: that way rushes a sow from the mire. In such circumstances try whether you can quietly compose verses with music in them. The whole choir of poets loves the woodland and flies the town, in due imitation of their patron Bacchus, whose joy is in sleep and the shade. Do you wish me, amid this riot night and day, to sing and tread the poet's narrow pathway? The gifted soul who has chosen as his home the empty streets of Athens, and given seven years to his studies, and aged before his time over books and their cares, when he issues to the world is usually more dumb than a statue, and makes the town shake with laughter. Can I possibly, with self-respect, here amid the surging sea of life and tempests of the town, try to weave together words which shall stir the music of the lyre?

¹ Horace's name for his Epodes: see Epod. 14.

² i. e. the Satires. Bion is the philosopher and wit at Athens in the third cent. B.C., the traditional author of many pungent sayings.

A lawyer at Rome had in an orator such a good brother that one heard from the lips of the other nothing but compliments. The orator was to the other a Gracchus—the lawyer to him a Mucius. Are we poet-songsters at all less subject to that form of madness? I write lyric poems, my friend elegiacs: ‘a marvellous work of art, from the graving tool of the nine Muses!’ See first with what pride, what importance, we look round the temple¹ with its spaces ready for the poets of Rome. Presently too, if you have leisure, follow and listen at a little distance, and hear what each of the two promises, and on what grounds he twines for himself a garland. We submit to blows and belabour the foe, thwack for thwack, in the long-drawn duel¹, like very Samnites, till evening's lights. Before we part, I have been dubbed by his vote an Alcaeus. What is he by mine? What, but a Callimachus! If he seems to claim more, then a Mimnermus he becomes, and grows to the height of the name he desires.

¹ i. e. the Palatine Library.

So long as I am writing and wooing on my knees the people's suffrages, I have to submit to much in order to pacify the sensitive race of poets. Now that my literary work is over and my sense recovered, let me close my open ears and allow them to read without fear of reply.

Those who write bad verses get laughed at; but yet they enjoy writing them and pay reverence to themselves, and if you should hold your tongue, take the lead in praising their own composition, be it what it may—happy people! But the man who shall desire to leave behind him a poem true to the laws of art, when he takes his tablets to write will take also the spirit of an honest censor². Any words that he shall find lacking in dignity, or without proper weight, or that are held unworthy of the rank, he will have heart of courage to degrade from their position, however unwilling they may be to retire, and bent still on haunting Vesta's precincts. Phrases of beauty that have been lost to popular view he will kindly disinter and bring into the light, phrases which, though they were on the lips of Cato and a Cethegus of old time, now lie uncouth because out of fashion and disused because old. He will admit to the franchise new phrases which use has fathered and given to the world. In strength and clearness, like a crystal stream, he will pour his wealth along, and bless Latium with a richer tongue. What is too luxuriant he will prune: what is too rough he will smooth with sober refinement: what wholly lacks force he will away with. He will look to you as though at play, much though it will cost him¹, like the dancer who can represent now a Satyr, now the clownish Cyclops.

¹ He describes the dishonest criticism which only ends in mutual compliments between two poets who read their compositions to one another. There seems to be a special reference to Propertius, who had called himself 'the Roman Callimachus,' and whom Horace accuses of belonging to such a mutual admiration clique: 'Perhaps he will call me an Alcaeus. If he does, I will fall in with his own style and call him a Callimachus, even a Mimnermus if he wishes it.'

² The function of the Censor which gives its imagery to this passage is that of revising the lists of the Senate and the Knights with the view of striking off unworthy members. These lines, by a happy transference of their application from the poet to the lexicographer, were taken by Dr. Johnson as the motto on the title-page of his Dictionary.

I should prefer, no doubt, to be thought by others a silly and dull writer, if only my faults might delight myself, or at least be hidden from me, rather than to have a philosopher's knowledge and his cynical smile. There was once a man in high place at Argos who used to fancy that he was listening to a wonderful company of actors while he sat happily and clapped his hands in an empty theatre—a man who would fulfil every

¹ Well paraphrased by Pope:

‘But ease of writing flows from art, not chance:
As those move easiest who have learned to dance.’

other function of life without offence, a good neighbour, you may be sure, an amiable host, kind to his wife, one that could excuse his slaves and not fly into a frenzy if the seal of a flask were broken, one that could avoid a precipice or an open well in his pathway. This man, when by the resources and trouble of his friends he had recovered, having expelled by doses of neat hellebore the madness and the bile that caused it, and come again to himself, cried 'By Pollux, my friends, you have killed me, not saved me alive, in that you have torn a pleasure from my grasp, and by force robbed me of a delightful illusion.'

The truth is, it is profitable indeed to turn philosopher, if it means to lay aside trifling and give up play to lads whom it beseems, no longer to hunt for words that will go to the music of a Latin lyre, but to get by heart the rhythms and melodies of a rightly ordered life. Wherefore I talk to myself in this way and, for no one to hear, recall old sayings thus:—

If no quantity of water could quench your thirst, you would tell the doctor. Have you not the courage to confess to any one that the more you get the more you want? If a wound were not alleviated by some root or herb that had been prescribed, you would desist from treating yourself with the root or herb which did you no good. You had been told that if the gods gave a man wealth, folly and its perversities left him: yet seeing that you have grown no wiser since your purse has been fuller, will you still listen to the same adviser? No doubt if wealth could really make you wise, if it could make you less apt to desire or to fear, your blushes should be if there lived on earth one more greedy of it than you.

If that is a man's own which he buys with balance and coin¹, there are cases also (so the lawyers tell us) where occupation gives ownership. The land from which your food comes is yours. The bailiff of Orbius, when he harrows the corn-land which is presently to supply you with grain, feels you to be his master. You give coin; you receive a bunch of grapes, chickens, eggs, a jar of wine: in that way, you see, you buy by instalments the land, even though perhaps, to buy it at once, it cost three hundred thousand sesterces or more. What matters it whether the money which finds your food was paid down just now or years ago? Again, the man who once purchased a farm at Aricia or Veii purchased the vegetables he sups on, though he thinks otherwise, purchased the logs with which he boils his kettle on a cold evening. Yet he calls it all his own to the spot where the line of poplars is set to prevent neighbours from quarrelling: as though anything were a man's own, which in a moment of flying time, now by request, now by purchase, now by force, now, if not before, by death, changes owners and becomes the property of another. Inasmuch then as to no one is given perpetual occupation—heir follows heir as wave follows wave—what is the profit of estates or storehouses, what of forests in Lucania added to forests in Calabria, if death mows down great and small, and no gold will buy him off? Gems, marble, ivory, Tuscan seals, pictures, silver plate, raiment dipped in Gaetulan purple, there are those who have not these—one I know who cares not to have them.

¹ In a formal act of sale a witness held a balance and the purchaser touched it with a brass coin, which he then handed to the vendor.

Why of two brothers one cares to idle and play and use unguents more than to own the rich palm-groves of Herod; the other, wealthy and insatiable of wealth, from daybreak to the shadows of evening is busy taming with fire and steel his woodland estate, is known to the Genius¹, the companion who tempers the birth-star, the god of human nature, that is to die with each life, that changes in face with it, is black or white.

I shall use and take from my modest heap as much as need requires, nor shall I fear what an heir may think of me because he does not find more than I leave him. And yet, at the same time, I shall wish to remember how far the frank and gay differs from the spendthrift, how great the variance between the thrifty and the miserly. For difference there is whether you scatter your substance lavishly; or, while neither grudging any expense nor anxious to add to your store, are ready, like the schoolboy when the holidays come, to take and enjoy the short and pleasant moment. Far from me be the poverty that makes a squalid home! But if the ship carries me, it will carry me, and I shall be myself still, whether it be a large one or a small. Though we do not run with bellying sail before a favouring north wind, neither are we spending a lifetime with a south wind in our teeth; in strength, in wit, in looks, in virtue, in position, in estate, the last of the foremost, ever ahead of the hindmost.

¹ The 'Genius' is the idea of the man projected outside of himself. To say therefore that the Genius knows why he differs from another man is only to say that such differences are ultimate facts. Each man is what he is.

You are no miser—excellent! Well, have all the other vices run away with that one? Is your bosom free from empty ambitions? Is it free from alarm and anger in face of death? Do you smile at dreams, the terrors of magic, marvels, witches, ghosts of the night, Thessalian portents? Do you count your birthdays with gratitude? Do you make allowance for your friends? Do you become softer and better as old age draws on? How does it relieve you to pluck out one thorn out of many? If you do not know how to live aright, make way for those who do. You have played enough, have eaten and drunk enough. It is time for you to leave the scene; lest, when you have drunk more than your fair share, you be laughed at and driven away by an age to which play is more becoming.

7 THE ART OF POETRY

Humano capiti

An Epistle addressed to Piso and his two sons.

'The Art of Poetry,' or 'A Book on the Art of Poetry,' are names given to the poem in the next generation, but it is unlikely that either of them was given to it by Horace. It is not an essay in verse, like 'L'Art poétique' of Boileau. It is a letter, with close relations of some kind to the actual circumstances of the persons addressed. It is these relations (uncertain, because we do not know the circumstances) which give to the Epistle (as to Epist. 1. 18) what in an essay we should feel to be a want of proportion and of completeness in the treatment of the subject. It is professedly addressed to a father and his two sons, friends of the poet and united in literary interests; but as the Epistle goes on, it becomes clear that one person is really in view, viz. the elder of the two sons, a young man who is contemplating some literary venture, probably a tragedy, possibly (see p. 347) on a Homeric subject, possibly also (see p. 351) involving an imitation of the Greek Satyric drama. But while the form and detail of topics are thus ruled by a special purpose, Horace has no doubt before him, as in all his writings, a larger audience, and is enforcing doctrines which he holds to be of value to Roman poetry generally. It will be noticed that the poem covers a good deal of common ground with the Epistle to Augustus (Epist. 2. 1). This has been interpreted both ways, but it seems most likely that the 'Art of Poetry' is the later of the two, and belongs to the last years of Horace's life.

It falls into three parts—

1. Some general remarks on the essentials of poetry—on unity of conception, on diction, on types of poetry and their relation to feeling. (pp. 341-347.)

2. Then follows a long passage in which the subject seems to be narrowed, for some personal reason, to the drama: plot, stage rules, the chorus and choral music, the Satyric drama, metre. (pp. 347-354.)

3. A short sketch of the history of the drama as invented in Greece and imitated at Rome, leads back to a general consideration of the needs and duty of the poet, the defects of the Roman temperament, the place for honest criticism. (pp. 354-end.)

IF a painter chose to set a human head on the neck and shoulders of a horse, to gather limbs from every animal and clothe them with features from every kind of bird, and make what at the top was a beautiful woman have ugly ending in a black fish's tail—when you were admitted to view his picture, should you refrain from laughing, my good friends? Believe me, Pisos, a book will be the very likeness of such a picture in which, like a sick man's dreams, the images shall be impossible, in the sense that no two parts correspond to any one whole.

'Poets and painters,' you say, 'have always had an equal licence in daring invention.'

We know it: this liberty we claim for ourselves and give again to others; but it does not go to the extent that savage should mate with tame, that serpents should couple with birds, or lambs with tigers.

Often on a work of grave purpose and high promises is tacked a purple patch or two to give an effect of colour, when 'Dian's grove and altar,' and the water or the river Rhine, or the rainbow is being described. But at the moment, to tell truth, there is no place for them. Just so you very possibly can draw a cypress : but what is that, if the subject which you are paid to paint be a man swimming for his life from a shipwreck ? It was a wine-jar that was to be moulded : as the wheel runs round why does it come out a pitcher ? In a word, let your work be what you will, provided only it be uniform and a whole.

'that round the fair fields lingers as it runs¹,

¹ A quotation or a parody of such descriptive passages as Horace condemns.

Whence comes it ?

Most of us poets, O father and sons worthy of your father, are led into wrong by a vision of right¹. It is when I am struggling to be brief that I become unintelligible. I am aiming at smoothness, and I fail of sinew and spirit. One promises the grand style, and is bombastic ; another, over-safe and fearful of the storm, creeps along on the ground. So it is in seeking to give to a single subject a variety which is beyond nature that a man comes to paint a dolphin in a forest picture, a wild boar in a sea-piece. Effort to avoid a fault may lead astray, if it be not guided by art.

You will come across in the quarter of the Aemilian training school a worker in bronze of the lowest rank who will mould nails or imitate the soft curves of hair, but who is unhappy when his work is summed up, because he has no idea of representing a whole. I should no more take him for my model, if I were meaning to write a poem, than I should desire to be remarkable for black eyes and black hair while I had a crooked nose.

¹ This is the doctrine applied in Sat. I. 2 to morals and manners.

Choose a subject, ye who write, equal to your The remedy. strength; and ponder long what your shoulders will refuse, what they will be strong enough to bear. If a man's subject be chosen effectively¹, neither ready speech will fail him nor clearness of order.

Of order this will be the excellence and beauty, if I am not mistaken, that, in a poem for which the world is looking, one say at this moment what at this moment needs saying; put off the mass of things and let them be for the present; love this, despise that.

In the same way, if you are nice and careful in Diction. combining your words², you may gain the finest effects in language by the skilful setting which makes a well-known word new. If so be there are abstruse things which absolutely require new terms to make them clear, it will be in your power to frame words which never sounded in the ears of a cinctured Cethegus³, and free pardon will be granted if the licence be used modestly. New words and words of yesterday's framing will find acceptance if the source from which they flow be Greek, and if the stream be turned on sparingly. Think you that there is any licence which Romans will grant to Cæcilius and Plautus, and then refuse to Virgil and Varius? Why should you grudge even such an one as myself the right of adding, if I can, something to the store, when the tongue of Cato and of Ennius has been permitted to enrich our mother-speech by giving to the world new names for things? Each generation has been allowed, and will be allowed still to issue words that bear the mint-mark of the day. As the forest changes its leaves with each year that runs swiftly by—those that came first drop off—so with words, the elder race dies out; like a young generation, the new ones bloom and thrive. Death claims us and all that belongs to us. Whether Neptune's sea taken into the bosom of the dry land gives fleets a shelter from the north winds—a work worthy of kings¹—; or swamp, long a waste where boats could paddle, feeds neighbouring cities and feels the weight of the plough; or river has changed the course which damaged the corn-lands and learnt a better path; all the work of man's hands must perish. Think not then that the words he says can keep place and power undecayed. Many a term which has fallen from use shall have a second birth, and those shall fall that are now in high honour, if so Usage shall will it, in whose hands is the arbitrament, the right and rule of speech.

¹ Or 'to suit his powers.'

² Order is to be the key in the diction as in the conception of the poem.

³ The orator, see p. 333. The 'cincture' is a form of wearing the tunic belonging to ancient times.

*Types of
poetry.*

In what measure the feats of kings and captains and war's sad tale may be written, Homer showed us. To couplets of long and short was assigned in the first place the voice of complaint; afterwards also the sense of granted prayer¹: but who it was who first gave to the world the modest elegy, scholars dispute, and the case is still before the courts. The iambus was the fitting weapon which his rage found for Archilochus. That foot both sock and lofty buskins borrowed, as fit for speech and reply and to be heard across a noisy audience, and by nature meant for men in action. To lyric song the Muse assigned to tell of gods and children of gods, of the victor in boxing, the horse first in the race, and the troubles of young hearts and the lighthearted banquet.

¹ This refers to the formation of the Portus Julius by joining the Lucrine and Avernian lakes, which is spoken of by Virgil in Georg. 2. 161 foll. The following lines must describe the draining of the Pomptine marshes and some rectification of the course of the Tiber.

The changing parts and tone of each kind of poetry have had their limits set. If from inability or ignorance I cannot keep to them, why am I hailed a poet? Why through false shame do I prefer to remain ignorant rather than to learn? A theme that belongs to Comedy will not be set forth in the verses of Tragedy. So too the supper of Thyestes disdains to be told in strains of common life which suit well enough the comic sock. Each has had its becoming place allotted: let them keep to it.

But yet sometimes Comedy raises its tone and a Chremes in his wrath declaims his wrongs in mouthings phrase; and in the same way Telephus and Peleus, so tragical generally², in their pain take to the language of prose when, in poverty and exile, one and the other throws aside his paint-pots¹ and his words a foot and a half long², if he cares that his sorrows should go home to the spectator's heart.

¹ Horace is thinking of the use of the elegiac couplet as the metre of inscriptions, whether for memorials of the dead or for votive offerings.

² Plerumque may be taken also with the sentence, generalizing, 'a Telephus and a Peleus, in a tragedy, usually, &c.'

Feeling is the true basis.

It is not enough that poems have beauty of form: they must have charm, and draw the hearer's feelings which way they will. Men smile—such is human nature—on those who smile: on the same terms they wait on those that weep. If you wish to draw tears from me, you must first feel pain yourself: then, good Telephus or Peleus, your misfortunes will touch me. If the part put into your mouth be ill suited I shall yawn or I shall laugh. With a gloomy face go sad words, with an angry one words of bluster, jests with a playful face, saws of wisdom with a grave one: for Nature first makes us take in our souls the impress of external circumstance, makes us glad, or gives an impulse to anger, or bows us to the ground and tortures us under a load of grief; then, with the tongue for her interpreter, she makes known the emotions of the heart. If the speaker's language rings false to his circumstances, all Rome, front seats and back alike³, will join the laugh against him. It will make grave difference whether a god be speaking or a demigod, a ripe old man or one in the flower and heat of youth, a wandering trader or the tiller of a blooming farm, a Colchian or an Assyrian, one bred at Thebes or at Argos.

¹ Ampulla is a painter's oil-flask, and is used for coloured language.

² Perhaps, as Sir Walter Scott translates it (in 'Woodstock'), 'seven-leagued.'

³ Lit. 'horse and foot,' a proverbial phrase from the old Servian classification of the people, but also with reference to the special seats assigned in the theatre to the knights and men of equestrian census.

Either follow tradition, or, if you invent, see that your invention be in harmony with itself. If so be that in your poem you are putting again before us the honouring of Achilles, he must be spirited, hot-tempered, ruthless, fiery, must disown law as never meant for him, must claim the world as the prize of arms. So Medea must be defiant and untamed, Ino tearful, Ixion forsworn, Io a wanderer, Orestes sad.

Characters.
1. Traditional.
2. Invented.

If you trust a new venture on the stage, and have the boldness to frame a fresh character, see that it is kept to the end such as it starts at the beginning and is self-consistent.

It is a hard task to treat what is common in a way of your own ; and you are doing more rightly in breaking the tale of Troy into acts than in giving the world a new story of your own telling. You may acquire private rights in common ground, provided you will neither linger in the one hackneyed and easy round ; nor trouble to render word for word with the faithfulness of a translator ; nor by your mode of imitating take the ' leap into the pit ¹ ' out of which very shame, if not the law of your work, will forbid you to stir hand or foot to escape ; nor so begin as the old Cyclic writer :

Of taking an Homeric subject.

' Of Priam's fate and glorious war I'll sing.'

What will this high promise give us that will not put to shame such mouthing? Mountains will be in labour, the birth will be a single laughable little mouse. How much more wisely the poet who begins with no foolish effort:

¹ Reference to the fable of the fox and the goat.

‘Of him, my Muse, who, when Troy’s ramparts fell,
Saw many cities and men’s manners, tell¹.’

His thought is not to give flame first and then smoke, but from smoke to let light break out. He means by-and-by to bring from his store things striking and marvellous, Antiphates and Scylla, the Cyclops and Charybdis. He does not begin a ‘Return of Diomedes’ from the death of Meleager, nor the war of Troy from the twin eggs. He ever hastens to the issue, and hurries his hearers into the midst of the story, just as if they knew it before; and what he thinks his touch will never turn to gold², that he lets alone; and while he gives his imagination free play, he so mingles false with true, that the middle never strikes a different note from the beginning, nor the end from the middle.

A first condition of the Drama.

Listen now and let me tell you what I, and the world with me, expect. If you wish an applauding audience that will stay for the curtain and sit on till the flute-player gives the signal for applause, you must note the manners of each several age, and their fitting hue must be given to the tempers which change with the years. A boy, from the minute when he can talk and set firm step upon the ground, loves to play with his young companions, grows passionate and cools again as lightly, and changes every hour. The beardless lad of man.*

*Four ages

¹ A rendering of the first lines of the Odyssey. ² Conington.

at last let go without a governor¹, finds his delight in horses and dogs and the grass of the sunny Campus, pliant as wax to those who would mould him to wrong, impatient of good advice, slow to all useful provision, lavish of money, eager, with strong desires, and swift to relinquish what a moment ago he loved best. The heart of manhood has changed all its tastes and seeks wealth and friendships, is the slave of ambition, is shy of finding that it has done what soon it may be anxious to change. Round the old man many discomforts are gathering; whether that he is still seeking and stinting himself—poor man—of what he has found, and fearing to make any use of it; or that he does all he does without courage or fire, dilatory in action, content to hope long, slow to move, and greedy of the future, testy, a grumbler, inclined to praise the way the world went when he was boy, to play the critic and censor of the new generation. The tide of years as it rises brings many conveniences, as it ebbs carries many away. That you may never give a youth the part that belongs to the old nor a boy that of manhood, remember that our attention will always be kept by traits that are attached and fitted to the age.

Action is either performed on the stage, or its performance is narrated. What finds entrance through the ear stirs the mind less actively than what is submitted to the eyes which we cannot doubt, and what the spectator can vouch for to himself. Yet you will not bring forward on the stage what should be transacted behind the scenes; you will keep much from our eyes for the actor's eloquent tongue to narrate by-and-by in our presence: you will not let Medea slay her boys before the audience, or Atreus cook his horrid banquet of human flesh, or Procne be turned into a bird, Cadmus into a snake. Anything that you thus thrust upon my sight I discredit and revolt at.

¹ Custos was the title of the slave-tutor who accompanied a lad to his school, &c.

² These are all rules from Greek tragedy in its best time.

A play which after representation would be called for and put again on the stage should be neither shorter than five acts nor lengthened beyond them.

Neither should a god intervene, unless a knot befalls worthy of his interference.

Nor should a fourth actor put himself forward to speak¹.

The Chorus. The Chorus has the part and duty of an actor and should discharge it manfully. Nor should it sing between the acts anything but what conduces to the purpose and fits its place exactly. It should take the side of the good, and give friendly counsels, and rule the angry, and cherish the law-abiding. It should praise the fare of a modest table, it should praise health-bringing justice and law and peace with her open gates. It should keep secrets, and pray and beseech the gods that fortune may return to the sad and desert the proud.

Music. The flute in old times not, as now, ringed with brass and become the rival of the trumpet, but of thin sound and simple with its few stops, was yet of use to support the Chorus by accompaniment, and sufficient to fill with its sound the theatre not too closely packed : for the people, itself small in number, met there in audiences that could still be counted, men of honest lives, of religion and modesty. When they had begun after conquest to enlarge their borders and compass their cities with wider circuit of walls, and gratify the Genius with wine in the daytime, without reproach if it was on holidays, then there came greater licence to the music both in time and tune. What taste could you expect of men untaught, out for a holiday, countrymen mixed up with townsmen, churl with gently born ? So to his primitive art the pipe-player added movement and wanton gesture, and as he wandered about the stage trailed a long robe. So too to the staid lyre new notes were added ; and headlong tropes made the diction strange ; and the purport of the utterance, with its wise saws and prophetic tone, was the very echo of Delphi and its oracle ¹.

¹ The Greek tragedians did not allow more than three (speaking) actors to be on the stage at once.

The poet who competed with a tragedy for the cheap prize of a goat ² presently also brought naked on the stage his woodland Satyrs, and in that rough guise, without sacrificing his dignity, essayed his jests, with

*The Satyric
drama—*

¹ A not unjust description of the actual style of the Chorus in Greek plays, its sententiousness and dithyrambic abruptness of metaphor ; but Horace is perhaps playful in connecting it with the more florid music.

² Horace is following the current derivation of tragoedia (goat-song). His purpose is to connect the Satyric drama closely with tragedy. It must preserve therefore a certain dignity. It is not comedy.

its general tone ;

the excuse that the attention of the spectator fresh from sacrifice, well drunk and in lawless mood, had to be kept by the attraction of pleasant novelty. But it will be fitting while you make your Satyrs attractive by their fun and sharp sayings, while you change from grave to gay, to see that any god or hero who shall be brought on the stage, having just been seen of all eyes in regal gold and purple, does not fall in the level of his talk to some dingy tavern ; or again, in avoiding the ground, clutch at clouds and emptiness. It misbeseems Tragedy to pour a flood of bantering verse ; and like a matron called to dance on a public holiday, when she mingles with Satyrs and their sport, it will be with some reserve. For my part, Pisos, when I write Satyric drama I shall not be content with the plain nouns and verbs of common life ; nor so make it my endeavour to differ from the tone of tragedy, that none should know whether it be Davus that is speaking and brazen Pythias who has just cheated Simo out of a talent, or Silenus, the guardian and attendant of his divine charge.

its plot ;

My aim shall be a poem so moulded of common materials that all the world may hope as much for itself, may toil hard, and yet toil in vain if it attempts as much : such is the potency of order and arrangement, with such dignity may things of common life be clothed.

its chorus.

If I am to be critic, the Fauns whom you bring to us from the forest must beware of philandering in too tender verses ; or again of rattling out obscene and vulgar jests, as though they had been born at the crossways or were wellnigh natives of the Forum. For those who own a horse¹, those who are free-born, and men of substance, are disgusted, and do not look with kindly eyes or bestow a crown on everything which the purchasers of bean and chestnut meal approve.

A long syllable following a short one is called an Metre. iambus, a quick foot, which explains how it came to give iambic verses the added name of 'trimeters,' because, though there were six beats, it was one and the same foot from first to last². It is only the other day that, in order that it might fall on the ears with a more leisurely and weighty movement, it received to share its inheritance the staid spondee; for it was yielding and tolerant, though not so far as in its complaisance to surrender the second or the fourth place. But in what the world calls Accius' 'noble' trimeters the iambus is a rare sight; and for the verses which Ennius sent so heavily weighted on the stage, it whelms them with the dishonouring charge either of too hasty and careless workmanship or of ignorance of the art. It is not every critic that has an ear for ill-modulated verses, and an unworthy toleration has been extended to Roman verse-writers. Shall I on this account stray beyond bounds and write lawlessly? Or shall I feel that every eye will see my slips, and so keep safely and cautiously within the hope of tolerance? After all I have saved myself from blame, I have not earned praise. For yourselves, do ye thumb well by night and day Greek models. 'Your forefathers' one answers 'praised both the measures and the wit of Plautus.' Too tolerant in both points, not to say stupid, was their admiration, if indeed you and I know how to distinguish vulgarity from wit, and have skill enough in fingers and ear to perceive lawful rhythm.

¹ i. e. who are knights.

² i. e. the iambus was such a short foot that the verse which contained six was called not a 'hexameter' but a 'trimeter.' The point is that Roman poets forgot the essential character of the iambic metre.

*History of the Drama.
1. Greek.*

Thespis, we are told, discovered the Tragic Muse, a kind of poetry unknown before, and carried his plays in wagons to be sung and acted by men with their faces smeared with wine-lees¹. After him Aeschylus, the inventor of the mask and the decorous robe, made a floor of short planks for a stage and taught the actors to lift their voices and raise themselves on the buskin. Next in succession to them came the Old Comedy; nor lacked it great glory. But the freedom overshot itself and became vice and violence which deserved to be restrained by law. To a law it submitted, and the chorus became dishonourably mute when it was robbed of its right to injure.

2. Roman.

Poets of our own have left no style untried, nor has the glory they have earned been least when they have ventured to leave the footsteps of the Greeks and sing of native subjects, whether they have put on the stage Roman tragedies or Roman comedies. Nor would Latium now be more mistress of the world in valour and renown of arms than by her tongue, were it not that every one of her poets stumbles at the labour of the smoothing file. Do you, O sons of Pompilius' blood¹, condemn any poem which many a day and many an erasure have not disciplined ten times over and smoothed rigorously to the close-cut nail². Poetry a laborious art.

¹ Horace seems here to be confusing the origins of Tragedy and Comedy.

Because Democritus holds the native gift to be something happier than poor rules of art and warns off from Helicon all poets who are sane, half the world take no care to shorten their nails or their beard, affect solitude, avoid the baths—for so, surely, they will win the rewards and name of poets, if they shall never have let Licinus the barber lay hands on a head too crazy for three Anticyras³ to cure. Alack for my clumsiness, who purge me of my bile as the spring season comes on! But for that, there is not another that would write better verses. Well, it is hardly worth it. So I will play the part of a whetstone which can make steel sharp, though it has no power itself of cutting. Though I write nothing of my own I will teach the office and the duty, whence the wealth of matter is gained, what nurtures and forms the poet, what becomes him and what not, what is the result of right doing and of wrong.

¹ The Calpurnian house to which the Pisones belonged traced its origin to a mythical Calpus, son of King Numa. Horace appeals to them as the 'blue blood' of Rome to help in lifting the national literature.

² The image is from a sculptor testing with his nail the smoothness of his work.

³ For Anticyra see note on p. 220.

Need of moral philosophy.

Of writing well the source and fountain-head is wise thinking. Matter Socratic pages will be able to set before you: and when the matter is first found, the words will not be slow to follow. He who has learnt what he owes to his country and what to his friends, with what affection a parent, with what a brother and a guest should be loved, what is the duty of a conscript father, what of a judge, what the functions of one sent as a captain to the war, he, you may be sure, knows how to give his fitting part to each character. My advice to one who is to pass as a trained artist will be to take as his model real life and manners, and from thence to draw the language that will seem like that of real life. Sometimes, if adorned with commonplaces and supplied well with character, a plot without beauty or solid value or artistic skill takes the people more and holds their attention better than verses, as they will say, 'devoid of substance, mere tuneful trifles.'

Greek and Roman temperament.

It was the Greeks who had at the Muse's hand the native gift, the Greeks who had the utterance of finished grace; for their sole greediness was for glory. Romans learn in their schoolboy days to divide the as by long sums into a hundred parts. 'Let Albinus' son answer: if an uncia be taken from five unciae what remains? You used to be able to tell me.' 'A third.' 'Good, you will be able to take care of your property. Now put an uncia on the other side—what does it make?' 'A half.' Nay, when once this copper rust, this slave's care of petty gain has given its dye to the soul, do we hope that poems can be created worth smearing with cedar-oil and laying up in polished cypress?

The aim of the poet is either to benefit, or to amuse, Double aim of the poet.
 or to make his words at once please and give lessons of life. When you wish to instruct, be brief; that men's minds may take in quickly what you say, learn its lesson, and retain it faithfully. Every word that is unnecessary only pours over the side of the brimming mind. Fictions intended to please must keep as near as may be to real life. The plot must not ask our credence for anything that it chooses: it must not draw a live boy from the belly of a Lamia who has just dined on him. The centuries of the elders hunt off the stage what lacks profit. The proud Ramnes¹ will have nothing to say to dry poems. He has gained every vote who has mingled profit with pleasure by delighting the reader at once and instructing him. This is the book that makes the fortune of the Sosii², that crosses the seas, and gives a long life of fame to its author.

Yet there are faults which we can gladly pardon. Perfection not looked for.
 The string will not always sound the note which hand and will intend, but when you listen for a flat often gives to your ear a sharp; nor will the bow always hit what it threatens to hit. But where a poem has many shining beauties I am not the man to be offended by a few spots which carelessness has let fall on it or human weakness has failed to guard against. What is the truth? Just as a copying clerk if he always makes the same mistake, though he has been warned, is without excuse; as the harp-player is laughed at who always plays the same false note; so the poet who is always halting is to me a second Choerilus¹, in whom something good now and then causes a smile of surprise. But if Homer, usually good, nods for a moment, I think it shame; and yet it may well be that over a work of great length one should grow drowsy now and then.

¹ i. e. young aristocrats.

² Booksellers. See p. 314.

As with the painter's work, so with the poet's: one piece will take you more if you stand close to it, another at a greater distance. This loves a dark corner, that will desire to be seen in a strong light, for it fears not the critic's keenest taste. This pleased but once; that will be asked for ten times and always please.

But second-rate poetry intolerable.

O elder of my young friends, though you have your father's voice to mould you to right judgement besides your own native wit, take home to yourself this saying and remember it, that there is a limit to the matters in which the moderate and the bearable are rightly tolerated. A second-rate lawyer or pleader has not the excellence of Messalla's eloquence or the legal knowledge of Aulus Cascellius, yet he has his value. To poets to be second-rate is a privilege which neither men nor gods nor book-stalls ever allowed. As at a pleasant banquet music out of tune, or a coarse unguent, or Sardinian honey with the poppy-seeds², offend us because we could have got through the supper without these things; so a poem, the purpose of which is to please the taste, if it fails at all of the highest point, drops to the lowest. The man who cannot play the games leaves alone the implements of the Campus, and if he has never learnt the use of ball or hoop or quoit does not play with them, lest the dense ring of spectators laugh long and loud at him. Yet the man who cannot write verses writes them still. Why may he not? A freeman, the son of a freeman, nay more, one rated at the full property of a knight, and with not a fault or flaw about him!

¹ See p. 327.

² Roasted poppy-seeds and honey was a dish at dessert. Sardinian honey had a bad name.

You will say nothing, do nothing, unless Minerva pleases¹. That is your decision, your first principle. Yet if ever by-and-by you shall compose something, let it have a patient hearing from some Maecius² as your critic and from your father and me; and then put the parchments in the cupboard, and let them be kept quiet till the ninth year.* What you have not published you will be able to destroy. The word once uncaged never comes home again.

When men were yet savage, Orpheus, the sacred, the mouthpiece of the gods, awed them from bloodshed and the foulness of their living; whence the legend said that he tamed tigers and ravening lions. So Amphion is said, because he was the builder of the walls of Thebes, to have moved stones by the sound of his shell, and to have led them whither he would by the spell of his entreaty. This was what men meant by 'wisdom' in old days—to separate the rights of one

Value and dignity of poetry.

¹ A proverb = 'against the grain.' 'You will consult your taste and capacity.'

² See note on p. 201.

from the rights of all, divine things from common, to forbid lawless love and prescribe rules of wedded life, to build cities and grave laws on wooden tables. 'Twas so that poets and their song won the honour and the name of divine. Homer, whose fame is next to theirs, and Tyrtaeus by their verses made manly hearts beat high for battles of Mars. In song oracles were given, and men were guided in the ways of life; the favour of kings was courted in strains learnt of the Muses, and amusement was found to crown the close of long toil. So little need the Muse skilled in the lyre or the singer Apollo cause you a blush.

Is the poet born or made?

It is an old question whether a praiseworthy poem be the creation of Nature or of Art. For my part I do not see what study can do without a rich vein of native gift, nor what the native gift can do without culture: so much does each ask of the other and swear eternal alliance with it. He whose ambition is to reach the wished-for goal of the racecourse has borne much and done much in his boyhood, has sweated and shivered, has denied himself love and wine. The pipe-player who is chosen to play the Pythian piece¹ has learnt his lesson some time ago under the fear of a master. In these days it is thought enough to say 'My poems are admirable. Plague take the hindmost. I am ashamed to be left behind in the race and to confess that in good sooth I do not know an art which I have never learnt.'

*Venal
criticism.*

As the crier who gathers a crowd to his auction, so

¹ At the Pythian games.

a poet can bid flatterers flock where gain is to be had, if he has wealth in land, wealth in moneys out at interest. But if there be one who can serve a dainty dinner as it should be served, and go bail for a poor friend of small credit, or snatch one from the dread meshes of the law, I shall wonder indeed if he prove to know the difference—happy fellow!—between a false flatterer and a true friend. For yourself, if you have given or are meaning to give a present to any one, do not introduce him in the fullness of his joy to some verses of your own composition. For he will cry out ‘Beautiful! good! well done!’ He will grow pale at this passage: he will even squeeze a dewy tear from his eyes for friendship’s sake: he will dance, will beat time on the ground. As the hired mourners at a funeral say and do almost more than those who feel the grief in their hearts, so the man who is laughing in his sleeve shows more emotion than the true admirer. Kings, it is said, when they are anxious to know through and through whether a man is worthy of their friendship, ply him hard with their cups and put him on the rack of wine. If you compose poetry, you will never be taken in by the purpose that hides itself deep in the fox¹.

If you ever read anything in old days to Quintilius² Honest criticism. he would say ‘Correct, if you please, this line and

¹ Perhaps a reference to the fable of the Fox and the Raven. The Fox was the interested critic who praised the Raven’s voice and so persuaded him to drop the piece of meat.

² The Quintilius of Od. I. 24, the friend of Virgil, and one whose characteristics were ‘stainless faith, own sister to justice, and naked truth.’

this.' If you said you could not do any better, you had tried many times with no good result, he would say 'Scratch it out then; the work has been badly turned; send it back to the fire and the anvil.' If you still preferred defending your mistakes to correcting them, he did not waste another word, but left you to admire without a rival yourself and your own work. The honest and sensible critic, if verses are dull will point it out; if they are harsh in rhythm, will find fault with them; if they are rough in style, will make an ugly cross with black ink opposite to them; he will apply the knife to redundant ornament; will bid you clear up ambiguities; will mark what should be changed: in fine he will be your Aristarchus¹. He will not say 'Why should I quarrel with my friend about trifles?' These trifles will bring the friend into serious mischief, if he is fooled and given this ill-starred reception. Like a leper or a man with jaundice², or one frenzied or lunatic, the rapt poet is the terror of all sensible people: they fly at his approach. Children tease him and rashly run after him. Away he goes, head in air, spouting his verses, and if, like the birdcatcher with his eyes on the thrushes³, he falls into a well or a ditch, he may call as loud as he will 'Help, fellow citizens!': no one will take the trouble to lift him out again. If any one is inclined to

The self-willed poet.

¹ The great Alexandrian critic who put a cross (obelus) against suspected verses in Homer.

² So commentators identify the morbus regius of the text. Did Horace think it an infectious malady?

³ Perhaps from some fable.

lend him a hand or let down a rope to him, I shall say to them 'How do you know but that he threw himself in on purpose and does not wish to be rescued?' I shall tell them the end of the Sicilian poet: 'Empedocles in his desire to be thought immortal threw himself one cold day into the fires of Aetna. Poets should have the right and the power if they choose to destroy themselves. To save a man against his will is as bad as to murder him. And this is not the first time he has done it. If you pull him out now he will not then and there become like other people, or lay aside his passion for a notorious death. Besides, none of us knows how he came to be always writing verses. It may be he has defiled the graves of his ancestors, or set foot on some accursed ground and incurred uncleanness: at the best he is mad; and, like a bear if he has broken his cage-bars, he sets unlearned and learned alike scampering away from fear of his reading his poetry to them. If he catches one, he hugs him close and reads and reads till he kills him; for he will not let him go, any more than a leech will let go the skin before it is gorged with blood.'

OXFORD
PRINTED AT THE CLARENDON PRESS
BY HORACE HART, M.A.
PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

cf. Tyrell's Latin Poetry Mackail's Latin Lit.
Tutwells " " "

Exercises

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 000 112 867 7

